Cult members arrested

Israeli police fear millennium violence

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Eight adults and six children belonging to a Denver-based apocalyptic Christian cult were arrested last Sunday in the Jerusalem suburbs of Mevasseret Tzion and Motza, as a result of surveillance by a high-powered undercover team drawn from the Mossad intelligence agency, the Shin Bet internal security service and the police.

The group, called the Concerned Christians, is suspected of planning violent acts in Jerusalem ahead of the millennium to hasten the second coming of Jesus.

A joint task force from the three security bodies had been monitoring the phenomenon for weeks prior to the raid. A representative of the task force warned that some cults in the United States may decide to commit mass suicide on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem – the supposed site of the second coming – if Jesus does not appear by the end of the millennium year 2000. The official added that there are one or two cults in Europe with a similar potential for drastic action.

Dozens of uniformed and plainclothes police, led by Jerusalem District Police Chief Yair Yitzhaki, swooped down on two spacious suburban homes about 1.5 kilometres apart on Jerusalem's steep, hilly outskirts, neighbors said. The cultists did not resist.

The episode highlighted the fears of Israeli authorities that the months leading to the millennium will bring an influx of religious extremists to Israel, some of them dangerous. Police said the group had planned to provoke a bloody shootout by opening fire on Israeli police, believing that this catastrophic act would hasten the second coming of Christ.

"They planned to carry out violent and extreme acts in the streets of Jerusalem at the end of 1999 to start the process of bringing Jesus back to life," said police spokesperson Elihu Ben-Onn.

The cult's leader, Monte Kim Miller, was reportedly not among those picked up in the raids. The 44-year-old former Denver man has described himself as a figure in prophecies in the Book of Revelations, and says he is destined to die in the streets of Jerusalem in the final days of December 1999.

"We are continuing to monitor the subject and we will take all the necessary measures," Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav, chair of the ministerial millennium committee, told Ha'aretz. "We want the year 2000 to pass quietly."

Katsav said Israeli security authorities were working hand in hand with their counterparts in the United States.

The report presented to the ministerial committee noted that additional members of the Denver cult planned to arrive in Israel during 1999. But the task force also acknowledged that it does not have a great deal of information about this or other cults, noting they are just beginning to familiarize themselves with the subject.

Officials estimate that about four million tourists will visit Jerusalem, a city of about 625,000 people, in connection with the year 2000. A force of about 400 police will safeguard the Temple Mount, where a sophisticated electronic system of magnetic gates, closed-circuit television cameras and concealed observation points has been set up.

A police spokesperson added that every effort will be made to give free access to holy sites by members of all religions, but attempts by extremist groups to interfere with the flow of Christian tourism will be dealt with firmly.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Cohen Was Friend of Israel

OTTAWA — Shaughnessy Cohen, the Liberal MP who collapsed in the House of Commons and died of a brain hemorrhage Dec. 9, was remembered by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) as a friend of Israel. A non-Jew, Cohen was immediate past chair of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group, a collection of 130 MPs and senators who foster good relations with Israel. In 1994, she also participated in the CIC's annual mission to Israel for elected officials.

Diplomat Honored

MONTREAL — Per Anger, the Swedish diplomat who served with Raoul Wallenberg in Budapest during World War II, was recently honored here by the Raoul Wallenberg International Movement for Humanity and the Canadian Friends of Raoul Wallenberg. The award was accepted on Anger's behalf by Sweden's ambassador to Canada, Jan Stahl. Anger, 85, worked closely with Wallenberg in providing Hungarian Jews with fake Swedish passports. Wallenberg, who is credited with rescuing 100,000 Jews, disappeared into Soviet custody in 1945.

Science Students Sought

TORONTO — Six outstanding science students will be chosen to represent Canada this summer at the Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence 30th International Summer Science Institute on the campus of the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel, from June 30 to July 30. The English-language program is open to students entering university in Sept. 1999 to pursue science studies, and includes a stint at a field school in the Negev. Application deadline is March 1. For further information, call Edie Bayer at 416-733-9220.

ISRAEL

Clash On Army Deferrals

JERUSALEM — Spiritual leaders of two haredi movements in Israel said no yeshiva students should be drafted into the army. The comments by four rabbis of the groups which comprise the United Torah Judaism bloc in the Knesset, came a few days after the High Court of Justice ruled that a long-standing agreement granting the students army deferrals is illegal.

Non-Orthodox Appointed

JERUSALEM — Representatives of the Reform and Conservative movements were appointed to religious councils in the Israeli cities of Jerusalem and Kiryat Tivon. The appointments came after Israel's High Court of Justice ruled that the councils must accept representatives of these movements. The approval of the appointments came from an official in the Prime Minister's Office after Interior Minister Eli Suissa refused to ratify them.

Residents Open to Deal

JERUSALEM — Residents of a Jewish settlement that has become surrounded by Palestinian self-rule areas following the recent troop redeployment in the West Bank said they would accept compensation to move. In a letter to a member of the Knesset, 39 of the 43 families living in Ganim wrote that they would be open to such an arrangement.

Shamir, Peres Agree

JERUSALEM — Former prime ministers Yitzhak Shamir and Shimon Peres asked the Knesset to repeal a law calling for the direct election of the prime minister. Advocates for repeal maintain that the fragile coalition of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was a result of the double ballot, one for premier and one for Knesset, instituted in 1996.

WORLD

President to Speak Out

BERN — Switzerland's first Jewish president says she plans to use her new post to speak out about her country's role in World War II. Ruth Dreifuss says she had refused in the past "to speak as the token Jew of our government," but now intends to seize the opportunity to speak as president, "which gives me much clearer legitimacy." Dreifuss took over the largely ceremonial post, which rotates among members of the Swiss cabinet, on Jan. 1.

Anti-Semitism Peaks

SYDNEY — Anti-Semitic incidents reached record levels in Australia in the year ending Sept. 30, according to the main Jewish umbrella group here. There were 324 such incidents, a 22 percent increase over the year before, and 16 percent higher than the previous record. On the positive side, the number of violent incidents was down, which the community attributed to increased security at synagogues and other Jewish institutions.

Yeltsin's Pledge

MOSCOW — Russian President Boris Yeltsin has promised a "major offensive" against anti-Semitic and extremist statements. Yeltsin's statement came after Russia's Justice Ministry said it would send the draft of a new bill against political extremism and anti-Semitism to the Duma before the end of the year. Experts believe that such a bill has little chance of passing the Communist- and nationalist-dominated parliament. In the meantime, Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov has declared that the "spread of Zionism" in Russia is "one of the reasons for the current catastrophic condition of the country."

Court Rules on Non-Orthodox Conversions

JERUSALEM — A court has ordered Israel's Interior Ministry to recognize as Jewish 23 people who underwent Reform and Conservative conversions.

The court opposed the stance of Interior Minister Eli Suissa of the Shas party, who has refused to recognize the conversions.

Despite the ruling, which ordered the ministry to register the petitioners as Jewish on their identity cards, Orthodox authorities will likely continue to refuse to recognize the converts, their marriages and burials.

But the court's decision, which gives recognition to the converts in all civil affairs, was hailed as a breakthrough by the Reform and Conservative movements.

Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Centre, said the decision "reinstates the lost dignity of dozens of converts and their families" and "opens a wide door for thousands of new immigrants and others who seek to convert."

The ruling drew a rapid response from Orthodox Knesset members, who are hoping to enact legislation that will bypass the court decision.

Web site focuses on dormant bank accounts

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish organizations and individuals with long-forgotten Canadian bank accounts may now claim their dormant funds with a simple click of a computer's mouse.

The Bank of Canada has unveiled a searchable database on the World Wide Web, enabling anyone to find out whether they have money in a dormant account waiting to be claimed.

The site enables searchers to type in a name or a word, or even part of a name. It lists thousands of individuals, organizations, schools and clubs.

Included are instructions on how to make claims online, and who can make them.

Eventually, all bank accounts which stay dormant for long periods are transferred to the Bank of Canada. The same goes for certified cheques, money orders and bank drafts that are never cashed.

A CJN search turned up 13 groups with "Jewish" in their names. All have unclaimed money in old accounts. Among them are:

• the Jewish Singles Group in Montreal has a forgotten balance of $21, last at the Royal Bank of Canada's main Montreal branch, dating back to 1985;

• the Toronto Jewish Soccer Club has an unclaimed $153.80, last accessed in 1987 at the Toronto Dominion Bank branch at Don Mills and York Mills.

• the National Council of Jewish Women in Nepean, Ont. has $205.18 waiting to be claimed;

(Also with an unclaimed account is The CJN, with a balance of $35 that has gone untouched since 1981.)

Some Jewish groups have heftier sums coming to them:

• the Trent University Jewish Students Association in Peterborough has $640.46 waiting to be claimed;

• the Jewish Hospital of Hope Foundation in Montreal can contact the Bank of Canada to pick up a balance of $591.99;

• the "Jewish Community Day School of Toronto" has an unclaimed sum of $874.39. The account was last accessed in 1973 at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, 199 Yonge St.

Other searches reveal Toronto's Associated Hebrew Schools, the Sephardic Hebrew High School of Montreal and the Hebrew Academy of Montreal's yearbook staff all have unclaimed funds in forgotten accounts.

So do B'nai Brith and a B'nai Brith Youth Organization chapter in Saskatoon.

Accounts of $500 and over will stay at the Bank of Canada indefinitely. Anything under that goes to the receiver-general after a 20-year waiting period.

The site is at [ucbswww.bank-banque.ca/]

USDS SPORT-A-THON

The Middle School students of United Synagogue Day School, Bayview campus, recently held a Sport-A-Thon at the Bathurst Jewish Centre as part of the Free the Children program. The aim of the program is to ship school kits to needy children all over the world. The kits contain pencils, pens, sharpeners, erasers, a box of crayons and a small ball.

Government fails to denaturalize Dueck

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the second time in four months, the federal Justice Department has failed in its bid to strip an alleged Nazi war criminal of his Canadian citizenship.

In a decision released in Ottawa recently, Federal Court Judge Marc Noel ruled that Johann Dueck did not gain admission to Canada through fraud or misrepresentation. In late September, Federal Court judge William McKeown ruled in Toronto that Peteris Vitols, a member of a Latvian auxiliary police battalion and later of the Latvian SS, did not lie about his wartime activities either.

With the two rulings, the Justice Department's war crimes unit has registered as many losses as victories since it switched from criminal prosecutions to attempts to denaturalize and deport alleged war criminals. Two, Mamertas Maciukas and Ladislav Csizik-Csatary faced removal as a result of denaturalization proceedings, while Wasily Bogutin has delayed his deportation by claiming refugee status.

In the Dueck decision, Noel rejected the Crown's case on a number of fronts. The Federal Court judge found that the most damaging eyewitness evidence against Dueck was based on hearsay and was not credible. Some witnesses had ties to the country's previous Communist administration and some had attended a public meeting organized by the KGB in 1988 in which the evidence of witnesses was solicited. He questioned the credibility of that evidence.

As a result, Noel rejected the government's contention that Dueck served in the Selidovka raion (district) police in German-occupied Ukraine from 1941-43. Instead, he accepted Dueck's contention, corroborated by government witnesses, two of whom had themselves collaborated with the Nazis, that he had served as a civilian interpreter for a local Gendarme police unit but

Bar-Ilan solution-seekers

The upcoming election campaign in Israel will be a mirror in which all of Israel's domestic tensions and conflicts will be reflected. As in all election campaigns in all democracies, the contending politicians will place greater emphasis on the country's dangerous fault lines than on its elevating peaks. The voters, and we, following closely the developments of the election at a large geographic remove, will be subjected to a constant cataloguing of Israel's problems.

And indeed, as we know, there are a number of serious problems coursing through the texture of that society's unique, multi-variegated, many-colored fabric.

We must not make light of these problems; nor can we dismiss them as merely marginal issues.

But nor should we ignore that there are many fine people trying to find solutions to these problems, or at least trying to lay the groundwork to enable the next generation to find those solutions.

During my visit to Israel in November, I met with a number of the solution-seekers on the campus of Bar-Ilan University (BIU) in Ramat Gan.

Yigal Amir stained the university. But that stain, thankfully, has long since washed away. BIU stands for tolerance of diversity and pluralism of thought and belief, values that Amir found offensive.

It is Israel's second largest university. It is a lusciously verdant, urban campus occupying some 70 acres, soon to double with the addition of 75 acres to its main campus; 25,000 students attend its 6,000 courses.

The "solution-seekers" at BIU are trying to reconcile the gaps between various groups in Israeli society: religious and secular, rich and poor, men and women, Jew and Arab, Israeli and Palestinian.

Dr. Ruth Halperin-Kaddari teaches at the faculty of law. She is co-director of the university's new interdisciplinary program in bioethics, philosophy and law. She is a leader on the forefront of the women's rights movements in Israel and happens also to be Orthodox.

Halperin-Kaddari is 36, married and the mother of three children. A graduate of Bar-Ilan and Yale University, she views as her personal mission, the improvement of the social and legal status of the women of Israel.

Keen-eyed, with a sharply incisive intellect, she harbors no illusions about that mission. As she told The CJN, "The key is in education. Our hope is with the younger generation, but we need the resources to influence the younger generation."

Dr. Ella Belfer was born in Russia at the end of World War II. Her specialty is political theory, but her special project right now at Bar-Ilan is to have helped organize and lead workshops for her students called Democracy and Judaism.

There are 20 such workshops, each with approximately 20 students. The workshop explores and confirms the compatibility of Jewish and democratic values.

"We have succeeded in securing a state," Belfer told The CJN. "But we must still struggle to build a state. We do not have an adequate sense of 'we,'" she said, using the Hebrew anachnu.

With enthusiasm and energy and excitement, Belfer unambiguously emphasized that her purpose is to help embed deep into the soil of Israeli society, Judaism's and democracy's intertwined roots.

Prof. Yaacov Iram was born just after World War II had broken out. He is head of the department of educational studies at the School of Education of BIU, Israel's largest. Since May 1995, he has also been the incumbent of the Josef Burg Chair in Education for Human Values, Peace and Tolerance, which was established to train teachers to promote fundamental democratic values: tolerance and mutual respect.

The CJN met with Dr. Iram in his office, along with two of his colleagues, key instructors Shimon Ohayon and Rachel Galley. They described their mission as three intersecting circles at the centre of Israeli society: bridging tensions between Jew and Jew, between Israeli Jew and Israeli Arab, and between Israeli and Palestinian.

The group delivers specialized seminars and workshops to teachers, teachers-in-training and parent-teacher groups.

The seminar/workshops adopt and adapt the Anti-Defamation League's successful educational program called A World of Difference (AWOD).

Supported by a small grant from the American Embassy, Iram and his colleagues are also conducting AWOD-based workshops for Palestinian staff at El-Kuds University. The two groups explore their respective cultural attitudes towards each other.

Galley feels optimistic about the program with her Palestinian counterparts. "We can only measure results in the long term. But we must start with self-awareness, then learning how to control our biases and our prejudices. We speak openly, we speak frankly and we speak with good will, trying to make some changes in ourselves as well as in the other."

The upcoming elections in Israel will generate a loud, deafening din of acrimony and accusation. Through the noise though, we must remember to hear not only the voices of the politicians but also those of the solution-seekers, striving in their own quieter way to solve Israel's unique societal problems.

Austria to help Jews recover lost property

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the spirit of coming to terms with its Nazi past, Austria has redoubled its efforts to shed light on property losses sustained by Jews before and during World War II.

In Canada, the beneficiaries of this policy will be former Austrian Jews.

"There exists a moral obligation to make up for injustices as far as is possible," said Wolfgang Spadinger, minister counsellor of Austria's embassy in Ottawa.

"Comprehensive compensation for the victims of Nazi injustice is in the interest of Austria," he added in a release.

According to Spadinger, Jewish property worth $1.5 billion was "Aryanized" following Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938.

The vast bulk of the booty consisted of real estate, businesses, equity, paintings and jewelry.

Spadinger said that Chancellor Viktor Klima has established a six-member Commission of Historians to study all aspects of Austria's restitution program so that those who feel they were not fairly compensated may file claims.

Referring to Austria's most recent restitution efforts, Spadinger said that former Austrian Jews who have so far received little or no assistance are eligible for payments disbursed by the Vienna-based National Fund, created by parliament in 1995.

And under an amendment to the Austrian Nationality Act, they may re-acquire their Austrian citizenship, without having to live in Austria, and thus qualify for various kinds of assistance.

Spadinger said that more than 1,200 persons around the world, including 800 in Israel, have reclaimed their Austrian citizenship.

By his estimation, about 25,000 individuals persecuted by the Nazis for reasons of race, religion or politics are currently drawing Austrian social security pensions, which amount to $270 million annually.

Since 1945, Spadinger said, Austria has passed several edicts for the return of expropriated property to Jews.

Not all the property has been claimed and restored to their rightful owners.

Works of arts seized by the Nazis were auctioned off by the Austrian government in October 1996. The proceeds were transferred to the Jewish community in Austria, which has the authority to render compensation payments.

Spadinger acknowledged that Austrian banks, insurance companies and industrial firms have been hit with class action suits by Jews claiming compensation.

These suits remain in the litigation phase.

For more information about these issues, call the Austrian embassy (613) 789-1444.

Jewish groups angered by messianic ad

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish groups have registered strong objections to a full-page ad in the Globe and Mail from a Hebrew-Christian organization.

"Is it reasonable to be Jewish and believe in Jesus?" asked the ad, which ran Dec. 21, the last night of Chanukah. It was placed by Chosen People Ministries, which maintains a congregation on Sheppard Avenue.

'Highly provocative'

The ad shows a picture of 16 people of different ages and purportedly different professions, all of whom have one thing in common: "The most Jewish thing we have ever done is to believe that Jesus is the Messiah."

The ad includes a clip-out for a free brochure "which tells the stories of 15 Jewish people who discovered that believing in Jesus is very Jewish – and very reasonable."

It is usual for full-page ads from so-called messianic Jewish groups to appear around Chanukah. In the past, these kind of ads have appeared in both the Toronto Star and Toronto Sun, both of which subsequently developed stringent guidelines on advocacy advertising, especially the kind which targets members of a specific religion.

In a letter to the Globe, Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of education for Jews for Judaism, calls the ad "highly provocative" and says it "directly offends a significant segment of your readership" with its "conversionary message."

Rabbi Skobac told The CJN the ad triggered a flurry of media interest. Radio shows in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal devoted segments to it.

In a letter to Globe publisher Roger Parkinson, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen called Chosen People Ministries "a Christian proselytizing organization," and said that the newspaper's decision to run the ad "makes [it] complicit in the ad's provocation of our community."

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) also weighed in, calling the ad "deceptive and misleading, as it seeks to proselytize members of the Jewish faith."

The CJN's calls to the Globe were not returned by press time.

Spanish historian explores lost culture

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Spanish historian Assumpció Hosta had a pretty good idea she was researching the pre-expulsion Jewish quarter of Girona, but it wasn't until she and her team discovered some Hebrew parchments that she was able to hold tangible proof in her hands.

The documents, which she surmises were no longer needed, had been used to stuff the covers of a book. They included family birth, death and expense records, as well as synagogue seat allocation and a page of religious text.

Hosta, who is not Jewish, spoke recently at a Saturday evening program at Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation about pre-1492 Sepharad. Her visit was sponsored by the Spanish National Tourist Office and Iberia Airlines.

About 12 years ago, she was asked by the mayor of Girona, a town of 70,000, to start a project based on the restoration of what turned out to be the former Jewish area of the city.

"From nothing we developed a big huge project," Hosta said in an interview at the downtown Toronto hotel where she stayed. The Patronat Municipal "Call de Girona," of which she is director, eventually initiated an eight-city Mediterranean Sephardi Jewish network.

The patronat (public foundation), which is funded by local and national government, is housed in Girona's medieval synagogue and includes a study institute named for Nahmanides, the 13th-century Spanish scholar and Girona native. A museum is in the planning stages, Hosta said. She and her team work closely with the tourism industry to plan specialty tours of Jewish interest.

Before the Jews were expelled from Spain in 1492, there were 1,000 Jews in Girona, a substantial proportion of a total population of 5,000.

Today there are no Jews in the city, although it's likely there are some descendants of converted Jews.

Assumpció Hosta

Currently, there are 25,000 Jews in Spain, with communities in Barcelona, Madrid and Malaga, and a few families scattered elsewhere.

She suspects there are more medieval synagogues in Spain than are currently known. There was a law in 14th-century Spain that communities could only keep one synagogue, she said. "The others disappeared. They were mainly converted into Christian churches. We have a theory that in some places churches today were once synagogues, but we don't have proof."

Non-Jews in Girona are interested in local Jewish history, although they've had little if any exposure to Jews, said Hosta.

When it became apparent that her research would focus on the Jewish community, she went to Jerusalem for a month and a half to study Hebrew, then organized Hebrew classes in Girona.

By the second year of classes, there were 40 students, and the course had become a university credit course.

Hosta's institute has held exhibitions of Jewish modern art as well as educational, historical exhibits.

For Hosta, the project has been like "opening a door to a new world."

Judy Halpern shows off a garter snake

Teacher brings environmental 'magic suitcase' to students

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Judy Halpern shleps her "magic suitcase" to schools around southern Ontario, it's not so she can perform tricks like pulling a rabbit out of a hat.

There are no amazing feats of prestidigitation in her repertoire, no death-defying illusions, no card tricks and certainly nobody gets sawed in half.

Nope. The magic in her suitcase is much more down to earth, more physical than metaphysical. It's designed to explain rather than to confound.

Halpern is a teacher with more than 14 years of experience who specializes in outdoor education, informing kids from kindergarten to Grade 4 about mother nature, her creatures, the seasons and all aspects of the world around them.

She employs an assortment of hand puppets, cut-outs, flash cards, bird feathers and other imaginative aids to get her message across and to interest the munchkin-sized students in the environment around them.

A former teacher in the York Region school system, Halpern now works as a freelance educator helping schools supplement their programs. She calls her company The Magic Suitcase because most of her teaching tools can be contained in one well-travelled satchel and they can be made to magically appear at will.

Based in Kitchener, Halpern travels from North Bay to Niagara, from Kitchener to Kingston, bringing the Magic Suitcase to appreciative student audiences.

She also has designed several teaching guides that comply with curriculum standards and assist teachers in presenting courses and programs that focus on the environment. Her bird kit, for instance, contains questions and tasks for the children, a guide to help identify different birds, cut-out bird silhouettes, a bird hand puppet, a bird call, goose feathers and cards that go with a food chain game.

Other educators' kits include Goin' on a Bear Hunt, which explains how animals cope with the changing seasons; Go Leaves Go, which looks at the life cycles of trees; and Earthly Delights, which explains nature's delicate balance.

Bear Hunt

Outings near the school go hand in hand with the kits since mother nature is just about everywhere.

On one auspicious trip last fall into the woods near a school in Waterloo, students witnessed a cornucopia of mother nature's creatures. They saw moles, a dead shrew, a garter snake, as well as a red-tail hawk, a chickadee and a woodpecker, Halpern said.

That's the kind of activity that really gets kids interested in nature, she noted.

A nature-lover herself, some of Halpern's fondest childhood memories go back to "doing leaf projects with my dad, collecting leaves and trying to identify them," she said.

Halpern later turned that interest into an occupation. She trained as a teacher and obtained a specialty in environmental studies. From 1990-94, after 10 years in the York Region school system, she got what many teachers consider a plum assignment, working at the Milne Outdoor Education Centre, in the Rouge Valley near Highway 7 and McCowan.

"It was a heavenly job," she said. "You're out there every day in all kinds of weather."

At the time, there was plenty of government funding for the centre and a constant stream of kids came by to learn about the environment, she recalled.

When she reluctantly concluded her four-year stint at the centre, Halpern and her husband, Rob Spackman, took a year off to travel the world.

They visited India, Nepal, East Africa, Israel, Malaysia, Thailand and Indonesia, among other exotic locales, and viewed firsthand how environmental issues impact on those societies.

When they returned, Halpern learned that funding for outdoor centres was being cut, so she devised a new approach to outdoor education. If the students couldn't come to the centre, the centre would come to the students.

Using the contacts she'd developed in her years as a teacher, Halpern arranged half-day programs at various schools, making sure what she taught was connected to the curriculum.

"The whole idea behind the Magic Suitcase is that you could go anywhere, do it anywhere," she said.

An upcoming highlight for Halpern will take place next summer when she and her husband, who is also a teacher, will take a group of Grade 11 students from Toronto to St. Andrews by the Sea in New Brunswick for a course in marine biology.

A trying time

The 15th Knesset of Israel will be elected on May 17, fully two years before its formal expiry date, and fully five months after its members voted on Dec. 21 to approve first reading of the bill calling for early elections, the culmination of a particularly acrimonious period of debate in Israel's legislature.

The government's coalition dam could no longer hold back the swirling high tide of emotions let loose by the signing of the Wye Accords some two months ago. To the right of the prime minister, former coalition partners and other Knesset members could not abide the very signing itself of the Wye Accords, inveighing against the further requirements upon Israel to surrender more land to the Palestinian Authority.

To the left of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the opposition could not abide his decision to suspend, even if temporarily, the implementation of those very same requirements which he had committed to paper and signed in the name of the people of Israel at the Maryland plantation.

Thus, by a vote of 81-30, the dam burst into a chaos of competing ideological pieces that Israelis will try to put together again on May 17. But re-assembling those many sharp-edged pieces will require the voters of Israel to endure a long and, if the past two weeks weeks are an indication, probably a very difficult and nasty election campaign.

Not only will voters be electing the next Knesset, they will also be directly electing, likely for the last time, the prime minister. A bill to repeal the direct election of the prime minister is even now wending through the Knesset, though if enacted, it would not apply to the upcoming elections. As of this writing, it is still not known how many candidates will be vying for the prime ministership. There will be at least three, (Netanyahu, Ehud Barak and possibly Amnon Lipkin-Shahak); perhaps five (plus Dan Meridor, Uzi Landau or Roni Milo) perhaps even as many as seven (plus Ze'ev Begin or Ariel Sharon). In case no single candidate for prime minister wins a majority of the vote, a run-off vote will be held on June 1.

The next five months in Israel therefore, promise to be an emotionally taut and trying time. The campaign will be loud and caustic. The peace process will be essentially frozen. And the many extremist, radically violent enemies of Israel will be plotting their own bloody interventions into the campaign.

As we observe that campaign from our posts in the Diaspora, we express the hope, perhaps naive, that the result that finally unfolds from the five-month political cacophony of accusation and promise, will be a stronger, more united Israel, more meaningfully at peace with its neighbors and with itself.

Arafat disappoints

One of those extremist, radically violent enemies of Israel is Sheikh Ahmad Yassin, the leader of the Palestinian Hamas movement in Gaza. Two days after his release by Yasser Arafat from "detention," Yassin roused his followers with a typically bloodcurdling diatribe against Israel. "The land drenched with the blood of the fallen is Palestinian, Arab and Moslem land...It is our people's right to oppose this [Israel's existence] and wage jihad until our rights are restored and we establish our state," he told his adoring audience. That Yassin would publicly incite violence against Israel is hardly surprising. That Arafat chose to lift Yassin's house arrest is also not surprising, but deeply disappointing nevertheless. He never misses an opportunity to erode Israeli confidence in the peace process.

Debate not possible with opponent of brit milah

Historically, those who have wished to destroy the Jewish people or completely undermine Jewish faith and tradition have pursued one of three methods.

They have banned the practice and teaching of Judaism. They have forbidden shchitah, the traditional Jewish method of meat preparation, and they have discouraged, scorned, ridiculed or prohibited brit milah or male circumcision.

In modern times, the excuses offered to try to ban shchitah and brit milah have been rationalized as being based upon "scientific" and "humanitarian" grounds.

But the underlying purpose has always been to undermine the foundations of the allegiance of the Jewish people to our history, traditions and observance.

Dr. Margaret Somerville declared her views on circumcision publicly some months ago and was heavily criticized. My impression was that at that time she received some education about the meaning of brit milah to Jews.

That education should not have been necessary in the first place.

Had Somerville asked knowledgeable people in the Jewish community about brit milah, she would have come to understand its history and its significance and the profound implications of challenging it or objecting to its practice.

That she still came to spout her nonsense, demonstrates a profound cultural insensitivity, particularly in a city with a large and strong Jewish population, including many Holocaust survivors and children of survivors, who have come from countries where brit milah was banned.

Even the most superficial research would have revealed to her the enormous lengths to which even adult male Jews of Russian origin have been prepared to go in recent years to have the brit milah that their parents had been too frightened to allow them to have when they were small children.

When I was studying to be a doctor in Britain 30 years ago, the experts in urology taught us that male infant circumcision was healthy and preferable – but its practice was divided along social classes. It was performed on the children of the royal family and a large percentage of young upper class males, but the lower classes avoided it because of its associations with being Jewish.

Today, some doctors think differently and discourage it. Somerville has claimed that research has shown male circumcision to be associated with harmful consequences, but every doctor has seen examples of phimosis, a painful and unpleasant condition that arises in young boys who have not been circumcised.

Those are ongoing debates within the field of medicine, and as we see, fashion can change on such matters within a relatively short time.

But religious Jews believe that our values are eternal. Many of our values have been around for at least 2,000 years, and in the case of brit milah for closer to 4,000 years.

Whatever words she may have used, she did not demonstrate any respect at all for a much older and wiser tradition, but revealed antipathy and animosity. There is no debate possible with such a person on this issue, only a complete rejection of her and her views.

Dr. Joseph Berger

Smiles aside, opposition to Jewish school help continues

The CJN article entitled "McGuinty expresses support for school funding" (Dec. 17) misleadingly suggests that he is in favor of extending public funding to Jewish schools. One may conclude, given other similar stories recently published by The CJN, that funding for private schools is just around the corner.

A more careful reading of the articles, however, demonstrates that any sense of optimism is completely unwarranted. The smiling face of Ontario Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty flanked by equally cheerful representatives of the Canadian Jewish Congress belies the Ontario government's continued discrimination against Jews and others as it maintains policies that deny these disenfranchised groups equity in education.

While the Liberal leader is not "ideologically opposed to ensuring public funds" for Jewish schools, he cannot promise any movement "until we first inspire confidence in public education." Mr. McGuinty is effectively advising us that he will not support the Jewish community in its efforts to obtain equity.

Why then the smiles? Our families continue to be burdened with high tuition fees, economically crippling large segments of Ontario's Jewish middle class. This outrageous situation is taking its toll on the community as families struggle to make ends meet. McGuinty's position is symptomatic of a political system that is content to serve the Roman Catholic and public school system at the expense of our children. We must send a clear message to our politicians that photo opportunities will just not do and that we will not rest until we are treated equitably.

The men who would be Israel's prime minister

By a vote of 81-30, on Dec. 21, the Knesset overwhelmingly approved a bill to hold new elections, the date for which will be May 17. In the immediate aftermath of the vote, politics in Israel have been swirling with news and announcements of new parties and new candidates for prime minister. Here is a list of the possible candidates for the prime ministership as of Dec. 30, 1998.

Clockwise from top left, Roni Milo, the former mayor of Tel Aviv, is forming a new "centrist" party for the election; Ze'ev "Benny" Begin is forming a new "rightist" party; Ehud Barak is the leader of the Labor party; Yitzhak Mordechai, the minister of defence in the Netanyahu cabinet, is "weighing his options," which are said to include joining the new "centrist" party; Uzi Landau, former chair of the Knesset foreign affairs committee, will challenge Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for the leadership of the Likud party; Netanyahu; former chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak will either join the new "centrist" party of Roni Milo or form one on his own; and Dan Meridor, former minister of finance in the Netanyahu cabinet, also said he will form a new "centrist" party.

Opinions

'Tis the season and all that

Christmas in Halifax is a two-month event. Promptly after Hallowe'en, the witches, ghosts and goblins come down and up go the reindeer and the jolly old Santa Clauses. On my daily walks to and from school, I see strings of colored lights burning brightly as a reminder of the occasion. 'Tis the season and all that.

Jennifer Fox in Halifax

Haligonians must take their holiday season very seriously to warrant such a large campaign of Christmas cheer. Torontonians usually wait until the American Thanksgiving to haul out their boughs of holly and mistletoe.

King's College takes a traditional approach. Every year, the school holds College Christmas, a day filled with tree trimming, carolling in the chapel, and something called Frivols, which I'm told involves storytelling. A friend and I have started our own College Christmas tradition – spending the entire day watching movies and devouring junk food.

Two months of a holiday I don't celebrate and not a hint of the one I do celebrate is a little much to take. While munching on dinner and being treated to the umpteenth Christmas song that day, I had a revelation. For the sake of my sanity, I would always live in a city with a large Jewish community: large meaning a city with numerous synagogues to choose from and decent bagels. I don't necessarily want to live right inside the Jewish community, but knowing I can hop on a bus, ride 20 minutes and get blintzes is all I ask for.

It would be easy to complain of the bombardment of Christmas images and claim that Chanukah is an unobtrusive holiday celebrated in the quiet of one's own home. Perhaps. But not in Thornhill.

In the heart of the suburb's Jewish community is a grocery store with a menorah made out of blue and white balloons. A minivan from a local Jewish community centre drives by with a functioning electric menorah strapped to the roof. The sight reaffirms the presence of Jews in the area. Chanukah can be as "in your face" as Christmas, but is this necessarily a good thing?

Chanukah has never been my favorite Jewish holiday. I prefer Passover because it brings my family together, or Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur because they're times for reflection. Chanukah is just a festival, though important to observe, which North American society has hyped up because it falls so close to Christmas.

Of course my disenchantment with Chanukah might have something do with my deathly fear of fire. This holiday is a pyrophobic's worst nightmare. Candles are lit for eight days and each day another candle is added – which just increases the chance that one will fall from its less-than-sturdy holder and hit a scrap of wrapping paper that might be lying around.

In my family, we light two large menorahs and three small menorahs, one for each child, totalling 220 candles. Throw in a cat who likes to rub up against table legs, and the chance of accidents increases even further. So far no fires – thank goodness.

Tacky lights and fire hazards aside, Christmas and Chanukah are supposed to be celebrated with loved ones. School is put on hiatus for a few weeks to be spent at home (or in Florida, which is quite popular in my neighborhood). A little holiday cheer regardless of the holiday; some schmoozing with the relatives and friends you haven't seen in a few months; and a chance to have a New Year's bash without worrying about missing classes the next day due to "exhaustion."

It's a brilliant idea really. And since I'm at home, someone else can strike the match to light my menorah.

Of sports and Jewish values

About a year ago, I lectured in the southern United States, and there I met Rabbi Mitchell Smith, who, in addition to his rabbinic duties, also serves as a counsellor to a variety of professional sports organizations.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I recently saw some excerpts of Rabbi Smith's preaching, in which he compared athletic efforts and the preparation they require to the way in which we approach the exercise of prayer and other obligations.

Here are some samples of what he wrote: "No athlete succeeds without constantly working to improve himself. A young gymnast who aspires to compete in the 2000 Olympics trains five hours a day, six days a week, in addition to his studies at university. Home runs swatted into the stands or out of the park may be the flash of glory that we see played time and again on the nightly news, but for a Sammy Sosa, a Mark McGwire, or any other athlete, this is a small fraction of the effort they have invested over an entire career. In a time when we are too often seduced by thoughts of instant success and instant rewards, athletes who have paid the price for their success are role models for us all. Life's accomplishments come at a price, but too often we lose sight of this and pursue the prize, unwilling the pay the price."

Rabbi Smith then quotes the Talmud: "If a person tells you, 'I have worked and not achieved,' do not believe him. If a person says, 'I have not worked, but still I have achieved,' do not believe him. But if the person says to you, 'I have worked and I have achieved,' he is to be believed."

Michael Novak, author of The Joy of Sports, writes that religions are built upon ascesis, a word that derives from the discipline that the ancient Greek athletes imposed upon themselves in order to give their will and desire control over their bodies. Ascesis signifies the development of character through patterns of self-denial and repetition.

"These considerations," Rabbi Smith writes, "come in an era when many of us in other walks of life have acquired a low tolerance for frustration, failure and plain old hard work."

Rabbi Smith then applies athletic lessons to prayer, which, he says pointedly, is not a spectator sport. "No athlete would think of stepping onto the field without adequate preparation. If we intend for prayer to have an effect on our lives we need the same kind of concentration that we have seen Mark McGwire engage in when he is on deck deepening his mental focus and clearing his mind of all other concerns. The same capacity to direct one's thoughts – to be fully in the present moment – serves the athlete looking to connect with the ball and the individual looking to connect with his soul.

"Our prayers are not answered when we are given what we ask, but when we are challenged to be what we can be. When we find through prayer and self-examination what is truly important in life and commit our focus to that, we can modify the impact of life's harsh decrees."

We are the same persons when we are engaged in sports or when we shop or talk to God. Everything is part of a life that in a way is controlled by our will, our dedication and our effort.

The world's like a huge game of Twister

'Twas the season. True confessions. My friend's uncle from Vancouver asked me yesterday, "So, how's school been this year?"

Erica Horn in Montreal

My immediate reaction: "It's nice to be on vacation."

This can be interpreted in two ways. The first is to assume that I had a horribly stressful semester and that I am trying to erase it from my memory entirely. The second option is simply that I am hoping to relish every last moment of these two weeks, that I studied hard and that I am trying not to think about school too much. It's over. I consider the latter to be a more accurate representation of my sentiments.

I must confess. For three weeks, all I did was eat, sleep and study. I found, however, that towards the end of exam period, I was extremely distracted by the situation in Iraq. I could not bring myself to finish my take-home exam for my Introduction to Rabbinic Literature course, because the computer and the television are not in the same room. I sat endless hours staring at the tinted green screen of the nightscape and watching and listening to endless reports from Baghdad, Washington and around the world on the unfolding events.

News reporters were struggling. Some didn't know which way to turn.

After the first night of attacks, some analysts said Clinton had attacked Iraq to distract attention from the issue of impeachment; others defended the president by saying that he acted in accordance with the recommendations of UNSCOM (the United Nations Special Commission). Everyone had an opinion, and even worse for us students trying to study, everyone felt the need to share theirs.

By Day 3, however, there were special reports on the situation in Iraq, followed by a special report on the impeachment hearings, and then a special report on the special report.

Innumerable foreign journalists were forced to report from the roof of a ministry building in downtown Baghdad.

If Clinton was really trying to have people forget for awhile about the impeachment, he definitely should have chosen some other strategy.

The intertwining of reports – on possible civilian casualties, the risk to the lives of British and American troops and Clinton's possible removal from office – was likely to (and did) attract more viewers than the New Year's Eve Dick Clark show from Times Square.

The attacks ceased, and I submitted my final exam (on time). A lull in all the action. Now... vacation time, relaxation time and anticipation time. How did I fare in school? Will Clinton be impeached in the Senate? (Please note: I am not implying a necessary connection between the two, despite my overwhelming distraction from my studies as a result of Clinton's military strategies).

I sit at my computer. Four hours, 17 minutes and 38 seconds until 6 a.m. My deadline is rapidly approaching, and my mother is waiting for me to finish packing my bags for New York (the Hornmobile is leaving at 6 a.m. sharp).

The tunes from the endless Christmas carols I heard at the mall today are almost out of my head. My brother just finished unwrapping his Chanukah gift: a copy of the Ken Starr report wrapped in green and red wrapping paper and a bow with holly (the bookstore did the wrapping).

The candles in our Menorah are out.

News broadcasters have moved on to the five centimetres of snow we most recently received. When will there be more? Will it stick?

I'll guarantee that tomorrow morning there will be a special report on the effect of the weather on the president's decisions and how Iraq is going to combine the celebration of Ramadan and Christmas. It seems it's a good thing that we got Chanukah out of the way – we wouldn't want analysts to have three events to tangle!

Our grades will be posted shortly. Damage from the attacks will be assessed. The U.S. Senate will convene. Ski hills will open all their trails. I feel like an observer of a huge game of Twister.

'Tis the season.

Republicans plunge into impeachment's murky waters

In a vengeful exercise framed by moral absolutism, underpinned by neo-puritanism and leavened by surrealism, the U.S. House of Representatives impeached President William Jefferson (Bill) Clinton, charging him with perjury and obstruction of justice. Clinton, one of the most progressive – and popular – presidents in modern times, now faces the ugly spectacle of a Senate trial in the new year. Not since 1868, when the accused was Andrew Johnson, has such a constitutional crisis confronted the United States.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Republicans, a majority in the House of Representatives, could have spared the country grief, rancor and divisiveness simply by censuring Clinton. Censure, as Democratic whip David Bonior said, would have been punishment enough.

Furthermore, censure would have reflected the will of most Americans. By plunging headlong into the murky waters of impeachment, the House of Representatives proved to be an unrepresentative body out of sync with public sentiment.

No one, not even his most ardent acolytes, denies that Clinton was the author of his own misfortune. By his reckless behavior, and through a strategy of denial and legalistic evasions, he demeaned himself, embarrassed his family and tarnished the presidency. His conduct, in the Paula Jones affair and in the Monica Lewinsky case, was foolish and reprehensible.

Clinton's attempts to conceal his shameless philandering did not rise to the level of "high crimes and misdemeanors." Clinton, for all his libidinous folly, did not use his immense powers to subvert the constitution, to diminish the rule of law or to undermine the nation's national security. He did not commit treason, theft, bribery or murder. He lied to a grand jury and impeded the administration of justice, grave infractions in and of themselves. But these, surely, were low crimes and misdemeanors, committed while trying to bury sordid sexual affairs. Try as he might, independent counsel Ken Starr – a Republican zealot behind that bland smile – was unable to produce evidence to incriminate Clinton on potentially more serious matters like the Whitewater land deal and campaign financing corruption.

Henry Hyde, chair of the judiciary committee, had grandly and piously intoned that impeachment, to be credible, would have to be bipartisan. Yet last month's proceedings, which unfolded surrealistically as the United States and Britain bombarded Iraq for non-compliance with United Nations resolutions, were jaggedly partisan. Only five Republicans voted against and only five Democrats voted for the two articles of impeachment. As a result, the process smelled of politics, and was not purely judicial beyond a reasonable doubt.

The rush to impeachment was initiated and nurtured by a coalition of southern conservatives like Bob Barr of Georgia and born-again Christians such as Tom DeLay of Sugar Land, Texas, who despise Clinton's liberal agenda, and who still blame the Democrats for having hounded Richard Nixon, a Republican president, out of office in 1974 over the Watergate scandal. That so-called moderate Republicans joined them in their sanctimonious crusade is a sad commentary on the effects of brute political pressure and lamentable short sightedness.

If you compare Watergate to the present situation, you may agree that Nixon's attempt to cover up the burglary of Democratic party headquarters by Republican operatives was far worse than Clinton's offences because it was a direct attack on the political system, a subversive crime whose magnitude would have been incalculable.

One hopes that the Senate, in its wisdom, will act expeditiously and spare the nation the agony of a prolonged and unnecessary trial. The Senate, in short, should censure Clinton without removing him from office.

Clinton, his personal peccadilloes notwithstanding, has successfully managed the economy, and is a reformer with good and sincere intentions, particularly in the fields of civil rights, health care and education. As president, he has exhibited an unprecedented affinity for minorities, especially African Americans, and he has fought hard to eradicate prejudice – the perennial bane of American democracy.

His record with respect to Jews is similarly commendable. "Bill Clinton is probably the first, openly warm, philo-Semitic president in the White House," Gary Tobin, director of Brandeis University's Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies, has correctly observed. And Clinton's efforts to further the Arab-Israeli peace process, and to keep Saddam Hussein contained, are also noteworthy.

I'm not suggesting that we should support Clinton because he is pro-Jewish and pro-Israel. Judge him on his merits. Based upon his accomplishments in domestic, economic and foreign policy, Clinton has been a better-than-average commander-in-chief.

It's a shame that the Republicans, out of ideological malice and a misreading of the constitution, showed such an alarming lack of judgment, proportionality and common sense. History will not be kind to them.

Saddam stands tall

The new year begins as the old one ended, with Saddam Hussein firmly in the saddle. As long as he is around, the Iraqi cauldron will simmer and, occasionally, boil over.

Desert Fox, last month's four-day bombing campaign launched by the United States and Britain, degraded Iraq's military infrastructure to some degree. Command and control centres, Republican Guard barracks and missile factories were damaged or destroyed. Also hit were hangars housing pilotless drones which can spray deadly substances over a city and kill and maim thousands of people.

However, dual-use facilities – breweries and pharmaceutical plants – which can be converted into chemical and biological factories were not targeted for fear of unleashing poisonous fumes into the air. This means that Desert Fox could not, by definition, fulfill its main objective of disabling Iraq's ability to produce weapons of mass destruction. Saddam, therefore, remains a potential threat to his neighbors, particularly Israel, which bore the brunt of 39 Iraqi Scud missiles during the 1991 Gulf War.

One immediate but unintended consequence of Desert Fox is that the arms inspection system, a thorn in Saddam's side since 1992, has run its course. The Iraqi government will no longer permit the United Nations Special Commission (Unscom), headed by Richard Butler, to work in Iraq. Unscom played an extremely useful role in the drive to defang Iraq, ferreting out and dismantling illicit weapons. Nevertheless, Iraq is still in possession of hundreds of chemical arms, tons of nerve gas, more than 100 germ weapons and parts for about four nuclear warheads. It boggles the imagination.

With Unscom banned from operating in Iraq, the United States will have no alternative but to monitor this vast country through heightened aerial surveillance, and to maintain a strong, battle-ready air force, army and navy in the region.

Iraq will be bombed yet again if it tries to rebuild its weapons of mass destruction, threatens neighboring countries, challenges Allied aircraft or moves against the Kurds in the far north. Call the policy, if you will, disarmament by force rather than by inspection. Only time will tell whether it succeeds. In the meantime, the economic sanctions are in place, and Washington is upgrading its relationship with the splintered Iraqi opposition movement.

Unlike in the past, the United States is now publicly committed to Saddam's overthrow. But don't hold your breath. Saddam, in one guise or the other, has been around for 30 years, and his regime is deeply entrenched. He can be deposed only in a coup d'etat.

Conservative Arab leaders fear and hate Saddam, at least in private, but the masses regard him as a hero capable of confronting the United States and Israel.

Desert Fox notwithstanding, Saddam stands tall.

Jewish Morocco slowly vanishing

By AVI BENLOLO

Jewish Morocco is disappearing into the past. Any evidence of a once thriving Jewish community can now be committed to history books.

The exodus of some 350,000 Moroccan Jews to Israel, France and Canada over the past 50 years has left a centuries-old infrastructure to endure the test of time.

Many synagogues that once echoed with prayer now lie empty and decrepit in numerous cities and villages. Some are being used as theatres, others as boxing-rings. Still others are preserved by a few individuals, mostly for the tourists, who either come to remember or to explore.

Genizahs in synagogues, where sacred texts are buried, are often pillaged by individuals who hope the ancient artifacts they contain will be worth something to somebody.

Some "genizah plunderers" have even figured out a scheme whereby they sell Jewish visitors documents which they claim have a connection to the visitor's ancestral past including ketubot, contracts and manuscripts.

Jewish artifacts that stand as a testament to Morocco's Jewish past have also become commodities. They are sold to travellers from abroad as souvenirs when they should be placed in museums as symbols of the past.

Many cemeteries have become run down and have been overtaken by the elements. Headstones in Marrakech's cemetery, for example, have begun to crumble and are overgrown with weeds. The absence of flowers is a testament to the lack of visitors. The cemetery is guarded by old men who aspire to bless their few visitors and direct them to a grave in return for a small donation.

Some cemeteries, such as the one in Fez, house small exhibits of the past desperately depicting anything and everything about Jewish life in Morocco, including photographs, news articles, books, Torah covers, tricycles, mirrors and henna dresses. It appears as if the cemetery is their final resting place too.

Most of Morocco's 5,000 remaining Jews have left their homes in major cities and towns throughout the country to form a small community in Casablanca. The infrastructure of the community is smaller than the past and includes several synagogues, a community centre, schools, a medical centre and a nursing home.

Those remaining in Morocco are either too old, too young or have too much at stake financially to leave. The population, however, is clearly continuing to decline. The young leave for France or Israel as soon as they complete high school. Their parents who are in business inevitably follow. The old remain to live out their days in the hands of the community.

The same tale can be told about numerous countries where Jews once lived. Despite this decline, the Jewish community in Casablanca recently embarked on an ambitious project to open a museum there so that the past is never forgotten.

But a wealth of Jewish knowledge and history remains to be uncovered and documented in Morocco. Further research needs to be conducted about the history of Moroccan Jews and their legacy – perhaps a documentary, Simcha?

The humble cholent

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The days are short. The nights are cold. And if there is one Jewish food perfect for the season, it is cholent. Since cooking is forbidden on Shabbat, cholent is prepared and pre-cooked on Friday, and left to simmer on the top of the stove or in the oven overnight. By Saturday morning, the fragrance of the cholent has permeated the home, and after shul, it's ready. Although cholent may not seem to be exotic fare, there are countless varieties and many closely held recipes. Thankfully, on the Jewish Highway, people share.

Eliezer Segal suggests that the humble cholent is actually "a sublime expression of Jewish identity." [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/940120_Tsholent.html].

When the Roman satirist Juvenal depicted Jewish poverty, he said Jews only owned "a basket and a box of hay." In fact, that "box of hay" is described in the Mishnah and the Talmud as a way to insulate cholent on Shabbat.

Centuries later during the Spanish Inquisition, Edicts of Faith were issued with tips to recognize people who were illicitly observing Jewish traditions. One example to help spot Conversos: "cooking on Fridays such food as is required for the Saturday, and... eating the meat thus cooked on the Friday."

Sure it's tasty. But can cholent be an obsession? Just ask the members of the Cambridge University Cholent Society [http://www.cam.ac.uk/CambUniv/Societies/cujs/cholent/]. The Society, which is "devoted to the consumption of cholent," includes both recipes and photos of some of their favorite creations. They even share the recipe for Cholent for 900 People. You'll need 50 kilograms of diced beef, 50 kg potatoes, 10 kg lentils, 5 litres soy sauce, etc. Unfortunately, the massive cholent was a bit too watery to the cholent maven who only gave it 7 out of 10.

If you need a recipe for a cholent that's a bit smaller, there are plenty out there. Philip Goldwasser provides some history and a traditional recipe [http://www.jcn18.com/Newstand/bonapetit/bt5.htm].

Yakar Elbaum not only reveals the family secret, but also provides links to other cholent pages [http://www.yakar.demon.co.uk/CHULPAGE.HTM].

The slow cooker cholent recipe [http://www.chebucto.ns.ca/~ab522/cholent.html] uses veggie dogs and barbecue sauce. And if you'd like to do without meat, here's a suggestion from Sandra Steingart [http://mail.bcpl.lib.md.us/~sandyste/recipes. html].

The proprietors of Jerusalem's Heimish Essen Restaurant have provided their Heimish cholent recipe [http://www.go-out.com/heimishe/recipe.htm]. But if you are in the neighborhood and prefer to have them do the cooking, Internet surfers are entitled to a 10 percent discount.

Usually, there's nothing wrong with modifying with a cholent recipe. But when the Washington Post's Candy Sagon tinkered with her mother-in law's classic, she was playing with fire [http://detnews.com/menu/stories/32233.htm]. All she wanted to do was get away from the standard beef, barley, beans, onions, salt and pepper and try something different.

Everything was fine until Candy's husband "lifted off the lid of the pot and looked inside. 'My mother doesn't use carrots. It won't taste right.' He gave me his best beseeching look. I caved. Out came the carrots. I put the lid back on.

"He lifted the lid off. He sniffed. 'Is that chicken broth? But you always use beef broth.' We poured off the liquid, added beef broth and water. I put the lid on.

"He lifted it again. 'Potatoes?' ... In the end, this is what was in the pot: beef, barley, beans, onions, salt and pepper. 'You know,' my husband said afterward, 'I really like this new recipe.'"

Jewish Life

Assault on history

By ELI RUBENSTEIN

About two months ago, the Globe and Mail printed an article by Eric Timm, a Toronto schoolteacher of German descent, who pleaded for the commemoration of the loss of German soldiers during World War II alongside the memorial ceremonies held for Allied soldiers. This plea is wildly misplaced.

Guest Voice

Our tradition – shared by many world religions – mourns the loss of life of any member of the human family. Thus, the death of the enemy, those who reluctantly went to battle and even those who willingly fought on the side of the Nazis, is a sad occurrence, an utterly needless waste of life. No one would deny the relatives and friends of these casualties the right to grieve their losses.

But Timm took his argument much further. He claimed that the German war effort is unfairly stereotyped and grossly distorted. He took exception with the approach that describes Germans as "nothing but militaristic, cowardly anti-Semites willing to commit any crime, including genocide, in their power-crazed rush for world domination," while ignoring the atrocities the Allies committed against defenseless civilians.

He concluded his argument with the following: "It must not be forgotten that the vast majority of German soldiers, airmen, and sailors did nothing more or less than the average Canadian would have done in their place; they fought for their country when it called them to arms, sometimes grudgingly, often heroically…

"My hopes are that some day German Canadians will be able to mourn the catastrophe of the world wars alongside other Canadians, that German Canadian war veterans will gain entrance to commemorative ceremonies, and that good people like my folks will not have to dread the approach of Nov. 11."

Timm's equation of the Allied losses with German losses, and his argument that atrocities committed by the Nazis are somehow balanced out by Allied atrocities of World War II, are examples of moral relativism gone berserk.

World War II was started exclusively and solely by Nazi Germany. This immoral and evil act was indeed a "power-crazed rush for world domination" (the phrase Timm himself derided). The efforts of Germany's armies led directly to the murder of millions of innocent civilians, not as a by-product, but as a direct objective of their overall military strategy. The Allies' response was a defensive measure, aimed at saving human life and restoring countries to their territorial integrity. To compare whatever criminal acts Allied soldiers allegedly committed during World War II with the over-arching terror of the Nazi assault on humanity is too absurd to even necessitate a response.

Further, to maintain that we ought to commemorate the "heroic" actions of German soldiers "who did nothing less than the average Canadian" by fighting for their country, completely blurs the reasons both sides were involved in the war in the first place.

If tomorrow, my country – Canada – calls upon me to begin a murderous campaign against the disabled, visible minorities, certain ethnic groups, or to invade a completely defenseless and innocent foreign country, I have three possible responses: To go along willingly, to go along grudgingly, or to resist.

Jewish tradition obliges me to resist, even at the cost of my own life, for I am not allowed to conclude that my existence has more value than another's. If I were to gleefully – or even reluctantly – join my country's immoral campaign, and die in the process, I pray no one would mourn my death as heroic, and include my memory alongside a ceremony commemorating the innocent victims of my country's moral recklessness.

Mr. Timm, mourn the needless loss of life of so many Germans who perished as a result of Nazi insanity. But please do not ask us to elevate their status to that of the Canadian soldiers whose lives were lost in the Allied effort to oppose Hitler, or to that of the millions of other innocent civilian victims from every race, nationality, ethnic group, political stripe, and sexual orientation.

A greater assault on their memory could not be imagined.

Roots & Remembrance

A family chronicle

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

On an autumn day in 1890, Daniel Baldinger, a 35-year-old married Orthodox man living in Krakow, reached a monumental decision: he would divorce his wife of 10 years, Reizel, because she had not borne him any children.

Baldinger was soon remarried to a much younger wife, Lieba, who eventually grew to love him and worried that she, too, would be cast aside if she failed to produce offspring.

"If I can't have children, I hope a carriage runs me down in the street," she sobbed to her sister-in-law. "I couldn't bear it if he divorced me."

Still childless after four years in his second marriage, Baldinger went on a pilgrimage to a revered rabbi in Nowy Sacz, according to Diane Armstrong, author of Mosaic: A Chronicle of Five Generations.

"There was an aura of piety in the austere book-filled room where Aron Halberstamm, the Sanzer Rebbe, held his court," Armstrong writes. "After praying with the other worshippers, Baldinger asked the rebbe for his blessing so that he would have a son. Aron Halberstamm had piercing pale blue eyes and a grey beard that hung over his chest in two Vs like a biblical prophet. When he looked at someone, he seemed to be able to see inside their soul. 'You will have a son,' the sage told Baldinger. 'Call him Avner, after the son of King David.'"

Daniel and Lieba indeed had a son in 1895 and named him Avner. Another 10 children followed over the next two decades. Armstrong presents many of their loves, laments, turmoils and tribulations in an equally vivid and dramatic fashion, just as though she were writing a novel of shtetl life. Isaac Bashevis Singer's The Family Moskat comes to mind, as does Bernice Rubens' Brothers.

But Mosaic differs from a novel in one essential respect: It is drawn directly from real life and presented as a true story – the saga of Armstrong's own family over five generations.

A master of both the personal interview and historical research, Armstrong excels at presenting rich stories from her family's past.

Some genealogists may imagine that ancestral ghosts inhabit their daily lives, compelling them to research their family trees. Armstrong, by contrast, projects herself as a ghostly presence following her grandfather and other family members through streets where once he walked. She is "a shadowy figure…pursuing him through the crowd, dogging his footsteps, craning to catch every nuance of his expression."

The title is a clever pun, alluding to both the Jewish fabric of the book and the array of characters whose lives are woven into the author's intricate tapestry. In the book's second part, which covers the pre-war and Holocaust years, many of the threads inevitably lead to the concentration camp and gas chamber. Part 3 conveys the continuation of life beyond the tragedy to modern times.

Writers in recent years have produced intensely personal histories of shtetl life and family history sagas. In Theo Richmond's Konin: A Quest, for example, a detailed history of his parents' home town unfolds as a personal quest. And in Journey to Vaja, Elaine Kalman Naves uses a "creative nonfiction" technique to reconstruct scenes and dialogue of her family's 200-year-long saga in Hungary.

With Mosaic, Armstrong, an Australian journalist, pushes the family history genre to a higher level of artistry, putting all the narrative techniques of a polished novelist at her disposal.

These solidly constructed scenes and conversations are true to art, but do they also meet the genealogist's rigid requirements for accuracy? Some might say not, but that is certainly a moot point, given how well the book succeeds on its own terms.

Mosaic: A Chronicle of Five Generations, by Diane Armstrong. Hardcover, 592 pages, illustrated. Random House, Australia, 1998.

Guyana's leader thanks Ve'ahavta

By RON CSILLAG

TORONTO — How does a Jewish girl from Chicago become president of Guyana?

"Oh, that's a long story, dear," responds the grandmotherly Janet Jagan (née Rosenberg), who has led the South American nation of 700,000 for the past year, following the death of her husband Cheddi, who had been a beloved president and fighter for democracy. "But it is interesting."

That's an understatement.

The 78-year-old Jagan is, in her own right, a popular leader of the former British Guyana, which achieved independence from London in 1966. Her country, however, has massive problems, beginning with the fact that it's the second poorest nation in the Western Hemisphere, after Haiti.

But there was little evidence of gloom as the president joyously took part in – by her own admission – her first-ever Shabbat luncheon recently in Toronto.

She was in town to visit her daughter, and address members of the city's large Guyanese community, but also to thank leaders and volunteers of Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, which has done much relief work in Guyana.

In 1997, Ve'ahavta organized a medical mission to the country, bringing relief to thousands of adults and children suffering from dozens of tropical diseases.

The organization is planning to return to Guyana from Feb. 19 to March 5, armed with thousands of dollars worth of donated medicines and vitamins.

A beaming Avrum Rosensweig, founder and executive director of Ve'ahavta, told the small gathering he never would have dreamed that his idea for reawakening the traditional Jewish values of tikkun olam and chesed would one day result in a personal thank-you from a head of state.

He kidded that during the Guyana mission, it must have been strange for the Jewish doctors, nurses and other health practitioners to know they were the only Jews in the country "besides the president."

In her brief remarks, Jagan said Ve'ahavta's efforts helped alleviate suffering in remote and inaccessible parts of the country, and reiterated the need for international cooperation.

But the thought on everyone's mind was how the former Janet Rosenberg managed to become head of a small South American coastal country that threw off the cloak of British colonial rule.

As she explained it, she knew little of Judaism, having come from an assimilated Chicago family whose origins, several generations back, was Transylvanian.

In any event, in 1943, she married a Guyanese dental student named Cheddi Jagan, who took his new bride back to his country. Almost immediately, both got involved in politics. In 1950, they co-founded the People's Progressive Party (PPP), and she became the first woman to get elected to the city council of Georgetown, the capital.

Three years later, she was elected to the national House of Assembly.

But in 1955, the British, fearing a communist threat, outlawed the PPP, and threw both Jagans in prison for six months.

The episode did little to dampen their fighting spirits. Throughout the late 1950s, they solidified their positions and became Guyana's premier power couple. In 1957 and again four years later, Cheddi led his party to convincing electoral wins, and appointed his wife to several cabinet posts.

During their tenures, the British formally granted the country independence. The couple then waged a 26-year campaign for the restoration of freedom and democracy. Guyana's first free and fair elections took place in 1992, with Cheddi Jagan winning the presidency.

But he died of a heart attack in 1997. His wife was appointed prime minister, and nine months later, was elected president and commander-in-chief of the armed forces – the first woman to hold the country's top jobs.

In addition, Janet Jagan has written several political, historical and children's books.

She was presented with a personalized chanukiyah designed by local artist Asher Benlolo.

Srebrnik explores lost world of Jewish Communism

Academia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Henry Srebrnik is a specialist in a phenomenon in the Jewish world which, for all practical purposes, no longer exists.

He studies the Jewish Communist movement, which peaked before World War II.

Three years ago, Srebrnik – a McGill graduate who teaches in the department of political studies at the University of Prince Edward Island in Charlottetown – published London Jews and British Communism, 1935-1945. It is a book which explores the rise and fall of Phil Piratin, a Communist who held a seat in the House of Commons from 1945 to 1950.

More broadly, Srebrnik's thoroughly researched volume is an intriguing case study of the allure Communism once exerted on a segment of working-class Jews in London's Stepney district.

Having studied this facet of Communist identity, Srebrnik is now hard at work on a book about ICOR, the Organization for Jewish Colonization in Russia. In Yiddish, ICOR was known as the Yidishe Kolonizatsye Organizatsye in Rusland. He expects to finish it by the turn of the millennium.

ICOR, with branches in Toronto and Montreal, championed the cause of the Soviet Union in general, and of Birobidzhan in particular. Birobidzhan was an ill-fated Soviet project to establish a Jewish socialist republic in the wastes of the far east, adjacent to the Soviet Union's border with China.

"A considerable number of books and articles have been written by scholars about the Jewish Communists and their support organizations," Srebrnik said.

Yet, to the best of his knowledge, no one has ever produced a scholarly treatment of ICOR, despite the significant role it played in North American Jewish leftist circles for decades.

"I hope to shed light on some of the following questions: How prominent were such movements in the wider political arena? What might we conclude about their successes and failures, within the context of both Jewish and North American history?

"Did they pursue aims congruent with Jewish values, or did their allegiance to Communism place limits on their freedom of manoeuvre and distort their Jewish orientation?"

Such research, he explained, might help determine whether ICOR was really a Jewish movement or one whose leadership pursued an agenda ultimately shaped by non-Jewish concerns.

"Given my preliminary findings, I personally tend toward the latter view," said Srebrnik, who was a passionate socialist as a university student, and who has since grown "older and wiser."

"I think the members of ICOR, and the rest of the Jewish Communist movement, were caught in the contradictions of their own ideology: an abstract though pro-Soviet internationalism combined with an interest in Jewish national regeneration; support for a Zionist-style enterprise in Siberia but opposition to Zionism itself. It simply couldn't sustain itself in the long run."

Srebrnik, whose research has taken him from Toronto's Province of Ontario Archives to Montreal's Jewish Public Library, says that ICOR's Canadian chapters in 17 cities and towns had 5,000 members by the mid-1930s. Among its activists was Reuben Brainin, a Russian immigrant who edited the Montreal Yiddish newspaper, Kanader Adler.

Srebrnik, 53, the son of Polish-Holocaust survivors who settled in Montreal in 1948, says that ICOR rapidly faded as the Cold War intensified.

As for Birobidzhan, a bold experiment in social engineering, it fared no better. "Stalin, after 1948, became increasingly paranoid and the Soviet Union more xenophobic," he explained. "Soviet Jewish intellectuals were executed, accused of plotting on behalf of imperialism and Zionism. The Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee was disbanded.

"Anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union was clearly more deep-rooted and resistant to a solution than the heady propaganda of the 1930s ever imagined. And it became apparent that Birobidzhan was stagnant, that its tiny Jewish population would not increase and that it would remain marginal to the future of Soviet Jewry."

Perhaps the coup de grace was the creation of Israel

Perhaps the coup de grace was the creation of Israel. "Many Jews, in the Soviet Union and elsewhere, drew the conclusion that the Holocaust was due to statelessness and lack of sovereignty, a condition Israel would at least partially rectify, but which Birobidjan could not."

In terms of his scholarship, Srebrnik's interests are eclectic. At the University of Prince Edward Island, he lectures on topics ranging from Canadian government and politics and Quebec society to the American political system, ethnic nationalism and Middle Eastern politics.

Before joining the University of Prince Edward Island in 1993, he was affiliated with the University of Calgary (where his wife Pat teaches English literature), Gettysburg College in Pennsylvania and Dawson College in Montreal. At these institutions, he gave courses on modern Jewish history, the Holocaust and Yiddish culture in Eastern Europe.

Born in Czestochowa, Poland, Srebrnik graduated from Outremont High School in Montreal. After McGill, he studied at Brandeis and the University of Birmingham, from which he received his PhD.

Srebrnik left Montreal in 1982 on the heels of a controversy. He and a colleague published an article in The Jerusalem Post depicting the problematic future of the Jewish community in Quebec in the face of French Canadian separatism. In response, the editor of Le Devoir, Lise Bissonnette, wrote an editorial suggesting that they had defamed Quebec. Several days later, the chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region, Frank Schlesinger, issued a press release which essentially disavowed their piece.

Srebrnik and his colleague sued Le Devoir, and the newspaper finally printed an apology in December 1985. "By then I was long gone from Montreal," he said.

After finishing his doctorate, he lived in Washington, D.C., where he was the opinion page and book review editor of the Washington Jewish Week.

Journalism was not something new to him. In 1967, shortly after graduating from McGill, Canadian Press hired him to track the stock market. The experience whetted his appetite for the newspaper life. "The adrenalin flows in journalism in a way it rarely does in a university."

Asked why he gravitated back to academia, he said, "Perhaps it's because one can pursue long-term projects that would be difficult to do on a newspaper."

Srebrnik, however, continues to dabble in journalism, having written for dailies in Canada on Canadian and comparative politics. As he put it: "I've never been one of those 'ivory tower' types who write only for scholarly journals."

CJC wants names released of Israeli psychiatric patients

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The dispute over making available the names of Holocaust survivors who are patients in Israeli psychiatric hospitals is still unresolved.

Though Israel has agreed to make the names known on a "case by case" basis, this does not satisfy the needs of survivors' representatives, said Moshe Ronen, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Such representatives claim that relatives will not come forward voluntarily, and that access to the names of all survivors in Israeli institutions remains "a primary humanitarian objective," Ronen said.

He released a letter to Shmuel Tsur, administrator general of the hospitals, expressing appreciation of the "case by case" offer, but asking for further action.

He said survivors are suggesting that the names be released to the CJC, or other umbrella Jewish organizations, who would then make the names available to survivor organizations, landsmanshaften and nursing health care institutions providing aid to survivors.

Ronen wrote that the CJC recognized that Israel may wish to avoid a public release of the names and other pertinent information, such as the town or concentration camp from where they came.

New Miss Tall Toronto raises issues related to height

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — When Gerri Rose tells youth to stand tall and be proud, she knows what she is talking about.

Rose, 33, who was recently named Miss Tall Toronto by the Tall Club of Toronto, was 6 foot 1 inch tall by the time she was 12 years old. As ambassador of the 50-year-old club, part of Tall Clubs International, she travels across North America raising awareness of issues related to being tall.

Tall Clubs, established in California over 60 years ago by a Disney artist, now has 65 clubs in the United States and Canada, and 55 more in Europe. Currently, there is a club starting up in Australia.

Rose says she was always the tallest in her class growing up, but it was not until she became an adult that she learned to appreciate her height. "When I was a child, it was difficult to find clothing that flattered me and that fit. Nothing was long enough. When I was a little older, everyone assumed I would date the tall guy, and play basketball and volleyball."

Things are a lot easier for this generation, she says. "Shoe stores carry a lot of larger sizes, and manufacturers cater to taller youth. Kids have more choice in clothing."

Rose, who met her fiance at a Tall Club convention, credits the club, which she joined in 1996, with changing her life. "At the club, I am close to being the shortest in the room. When we get together, we discover that we have so many similar experiences. We have something in common; there is a connection.

"We also discuss social issues and do fundraising." Currently, the club is raising money to buy bed extenders for hospitals – "many people do not realize that hospital beds could be too short" – and for the Canadian Marfan Association. Marfan is a potentially fatal genetic connective tissue disorder affecting mostly tall people.

As well, the club awards a scholarship to someone who writes about their experiences being tall or "different."

As part of her mandate as Miss Tall Toronto, Rose appeared on Canadian Living's TV program, taped a CBC program for children, and appeared on Global and CITY TV talking about self-esteem issues. "I always stress that young people need to have self-confidence, and they should celebrate who they are."

Parents, she says, need to teach their children to stand tall and be proud. "Self-esteem starts at home. It didn't click for me until I was older. I wish I had had a tall club when I was growing up. I would like to see a youth division of the Tall Club."

Chips are down: Jewish charities feel gov't pinch

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish charities are feeling the pinch in the wake of a government decision to eliminate permanent charity casinos.

Though the impact of the move varies from agency to agency, some charities have been hard pressed to make up the money they had expected would flow from casino events.

The permanent casinos were to come into effect on April 1, but public pressure forced the government of Ontario to rescind a decision to replace roving three-day casinos with permanently located venues.

With no charity gaming to replace the three-day Monte Carlos, charities were left scrambling to make up the shortfalls in their budgets.

"It's cut off the lifeblood for us. It's put a dent in our cash flow," said Allen Gerskup, a senior official with Maccabi Canada.

"We're accepting it. We really have no choice," said Lorraine Levene, executive-director of Na'amat Canada's Toronto section. "It certainly has affected our funds...It's lost revenue," she said.

"It's been difficult, obviously," said Elissa Hermolin, fundraising coordinator for the Morris Winchevsky School. "It's a big chunk of the money available to us. Gaming has always been a big part of how we raise money."

To soften the blow experienced by charities across Ontario, the provincial government has introduced two compensatory programs, said Gary Gladstone, vice-chair of Charities First Ontario. One is a $40-million grant that will be divided primarily among charities that had sponsored the three-day events. "The funds are slow in coming, but they are coming," Gladstone said. The one-time $40-million grant is four times the annual totals all charities received from charity casinos, he noted.

The second temporary measure is a distribution of cash from a $100-million fund operated by the Trillium Foundation. The funds will be allocated to charities through district funding councils, Gladstone said.

"We're glad the government recognized the need to fund charities but we don't like the handouts. We'd prefer to work for it," he said.

Gerskup, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee, said the organization raised more than $150,000 from three-day events over the organization's last four-year fundraising cycle. "That's gone. We can't replace it unless we get something out of the $40-million fund," he said.

Funds raised through casinos were earmarked for subsidies to bring athletes to Israel for the quadrennial Maccabiah Games. It also went to "ongoing programs in Canada," such as contributing to the administrative costs of the North American Youth Games and to develop youth programs, he added.

Maccabi Canada is considering steps to make up the funding shortfall, including hosting gala events, raffle draws, and soliciting contributions from supporters.

In 1997, Na'amat Canada raised $50,000 from charity casinos. Prior to the shutdown of the three-day events on March 31, it netted $1,500, leaving the organization $48,500 behind last year's total. Revenues from bingos have also gone down by $15,000 in 1998, Levene said.

The shortfall was felt in the organization's camp subsidy program, which partially supports about five or six children's camp fees. This summer, only one child received a full camp subsidy, she said.

Na'amat also "hasn't filled the [funding] gap" for its leadership development program.

"We're trying to compensate, to come up with other ideas, but times are hard" for fundraisers, Levene said.

Na'amat has applied for a share of the $40-million government fund. Among the other ideas being canvassed by Na'amat are charity auctions. "Today we have to look at innovative fundraising" as well as cutting costs, she said.

The Morris Winchevsky School averaged about $30,000 a year from charity casinos – in a good year, netting $50,000 – during the past 15 years, Hermolin said. Prior to the March 31 deadline, the school made about $10,000, leaving it far short of previous year's totals. From 25 to 33 percent of the school's budget used to be attributable to casino funds.

So far, the school, which has 70 students enrolled in a secular Jewish studies program, has "had to increase tuition. Because not that much time has gone by, we've been scraping by," Hermolin said. "It may turn into a bigger problem in 1999 when we receive no [casino] money."

The school will attempt to make up the revenue shortfall through new fundraising efforts, concerts, membership appeals and from the government funds that are now available, she said.

One avenue being studied is sponsoring more bingos. On average, the school receives $50,000 a year from bingos and the sale of Nevada Tickets, she said. In the meantime, "there is no talk of cutting programs."

The Jewish Camp Council, which subsidizes children's summer camp experiences, has "coped fine," said Ellen Nash, the council's executive director. "We were worried initially...but we've expanded some of our bingos to cover the [lost] revenues."

By doubling the number of bingos it sponsors from two to four a month, the agency's revenues have kept pace with the sums it received prior to April 1. Overall, the revenue from bingos contribute no more than three percent of the agency's budget, she added.

Roz Fine, president of the National Council of Jewish Women Toronto section, said the agency earned $4,000 from charity casinos to the end of March and "we really haven't made up the amount we've lost."

Volunteer loves Sar-El experience

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lorraine Cruikshank has been to Israel four times to explore her Jewish roots, the last being in November as one of 22 Canadian volunteers for Israel helping out at a paratrooper training base south of Tel Aviv.

Cruikshank, 47, believes her Spanish-born grandmother, Agustina Mercedes Martinez, was Jewish. On her trips to Israel, Cruikshank has talked to Shulamith Levy of Jerusalem, an expert on Jews of Spanish descent, who has supported the possibility that Cruikshank has Jewish ancestry.

"If I ever find out for sure that I am Jewish, I will make aliyah, for I want to be part of Israel," the Burlington resident says.

She says her grandmother, whose family owned a sugar cane plantation, lived in a Jewish district in Sosua in Puerto Plata, now a popular resort area of the Dominican Republic.

Cruikshank, whose grandmother died "in her 80s" in the Dominican Republic, says she has been "stonewalled" in her attempts to learn more about her grandmother from her late mother's three sisters and a brother who still live in the Dominican Republic.

"My late mother was Marie St. Onge, born in the Dominican Republic, married in Halifax, Canada, and who died young at the age of 49. She told me very little about my grandmother. It was a closed subject with her." Cruikshank's father, George St. Onge, lives in Nova Scotia.

Cruikshank says her husband, Roger, is very supportive of her attempts to find her Jewish connection. His own parents were missionaries and are buried atop Mount Zion in Israel.

Cruikshank's recent three-week volunteer trip, where she cleaned the kitchen and packed straps for parachutes, ended all too quickly. "I could have stayed another six weeks at least," she says.

Lorraine Cruikshank

In her volunteer group were people from Canada, the United States, Holland, South Africa and New Zealand.

One of Cruikshank's co-volunteers was Walter Ireson, 63, of Ancaster, a former superintendent with Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police, and a member of the Ontario Council of St. John Ambulance.

"I was very impressed with the love of Israel, and their commitment to it, shown by the Canadian Jews who were in our group," he says.

"Up to now, I thought that such feelings were just a Hollywood dream, but now I know different."

On his fifth tour as a volunteer was Len Berk, 64, one of 12 Torontonians in the group. He says one of the highlights for him was a chance to see early-morning parachute drops by Israeli paratroopers near the camp where they worked as volunteers.

George Frid, 67, of Ancaster, a former deputy police chief, was another volunteer.

Sar-El, the world wide agency that recruits volunteers for Israel, arranged sightseeing day trips for the volunteers.

Volunteering boosts Crohn's patient's self-esteem

Helps deliver Meals on Wheels

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Charlie Brewda describes the death of his father Zelik as a turning point in his life.

While saying Kaddish at Adath Sholom Synagogue two years ago, a devastated Brewda met shul president Mike Rogow, who got him involved delivering Meals on Wheels for Senior Care (now called Circle of Care).

It was the beginning of Brewda's dedication to volunteer service in the community.

But what makes Brewda's dedication special is that he has a severe case of Crohn's disease, an inflammatory bowel disease with no known cause or cure that disproportionately affects Jews.

The 36-year-old Brewda was diagnosed with the disease at age nine, and its unpredictability has prevented him from holding down a full-time job or getting a post-secondary education.

It has also left him with a colostomy bag since 1980 and has stunted his growth by hampering his small intestine's ability to absorb nutrients.

His brother Bill estimates Charlie has spent the equivalent of "two to three years in hospitals" for more than 20 Crohn's-related surgeries to remove sections of his digestive tract. Brewda's last surgery was in 1996, before his father's death, and he hasn't had a major flare-up since.

Charlie Brewda

In addition to getting Brewda involved with Meals on Wheels, Rogow also recommended Brewda to the local branch of the Red Cross on Finch Avenue between Dufferin and Keele.

He volunteered three mornings a week at the Red Cross, doing computer work, filing and typing, as well as helping clients of the agency's food bank.

Brewda, who lives with his mother Ida in Bathurst Manor and doesn't drive, stopped volunteering at the Red Cross in September when the office moved to Keele and Eglinton, because he felt the distance was too far for him to travel by public transit.

Margaret Goodwin, coordinator of the Red Cross office, says he was "very conscientious" and provided "excellent customer service."

"We had an emergency food program, so we dealt with a lot of vulnerable clientele. A lot of people who came through were very uncomfortable, and Charles was very good at putting people at ease," Goodwin says. "They were treated with respect as they came through."

Brewda currently volunteers one morning a week at Branson hospital's information desk – also on Rogow's referral – and participates in monthly bingo at Baycrest Centre with Adath Shalom and with the Knights of Pythias, a men's club which raises money for charity. Brewda is on the club's executive.

"It's changed me a lot, the volunteering. I'm more positive about myself than I used to be. It gets me out of the house a lot and I meet people. It shows that I'm a man," he says. "It's better than before, when I used to be in the house all the time."

In September, Brewda and Rogow won a Circle of Care award for their Meals on Wheels service.

"He's had so many operations in his short years, and still he hasn't lost his drive, his sense of humor," Rogow says. "He never shirks any volunteer work. He's always looking to do more."

Recently, Brewda sold Christmas cakes and cookies at Mount Sinai Hospital to raise money for Crohn's and colitis research, and this month he starts volunteering two days a week at Mount Sinai.

At 5 foot 3, Charlie now weighs 183 pounds – "a bit on the chubby side," he admits – but his brother recalls a time when Charlie was a teenager in the late 1970s and was much thinner.

"At one time, he looked like a Holocaust survivor. He was just skin and bones. He could barely walk, and we thought he would die," Bill says.

Charlie says life before his surgery in 1996 was difficult. "It was not good. I was in pain 24 hours a day. I was mostly home a lot. I didn't do very much."

Bill says Charlie "has gained a lot of strength from [volunteering]. It became a full-time job almost, and I think that's pretty admirable for someone who at one time didn't know if he was going to be alive or not."

Charlie says he's inspired by the memory of his father, who like his mother, survived the Holocaust.

"If my father was alive right now, he would be proud of me," he says. "He's probably very proud of me right now, even when he's not here."

BGU professor focuses on Nazi perpetrators' children

By KITTY HOFFMAN
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — Until recently, virtually no attention has been paid to those whose parents were Nazi perpetrators, says Prof. Daniel Bar-On of Ben- Gurion University.

Speaking at a lecture sponsored by the Victoria Holocaust Remembrance and Education Society, Bar-On, a psychologist, said that most studies on the impact of the Holocaust has focused on survivors and their children and grandchildren.

He said that he has been working with a group called To Reflect and Trust (TLT), which is comprised of members whose parents were either Holocaust survivors or Nazi perpetrators.

This has led him, he said, to work with other people who live in areas of conflict, such as South Africa and Northern Ireland, as well as with Israeli Jews and Palestinians.

Bar-On, an Israeli native whose parents left Germany in 1925, says his family's early departure from Europe made him one of the few of his generation of Israelis to "grow up with grandparents."

He spoke German with his grandparents, and viewed German culture as part of his personal cultural heritage.

Bar-On said that when studying the impact of Holocaust trauma on survivors and their children, he found that one of the major issues was a "conspiracy of silence" between Germans who claimed that survivors conveyed a message not to speak of their experiences, and the survivors who had no words to speak of their experiences.

He became interested, he said, in the psychological impact of the Holocaust on descendants of the Nazi perpetrators. His initial search for children of perpetrators was difficult, because it was not easy to break through the general silence. Germans did not talk of that period in their history, he said, not even with their immediate family.

From that study, published as Legacy of Silence, he learned of the loneliness that those descendants felt.

Some of the participants in the study went on to form a self-help group that met for four years, and in 1992, Bar-On asked them if they would be interested in meeting with some Jewish child survivors and children of survivors.

The new group, which became TLT, first met in 1992; of the 18 participants, nine were German, and nine were Jews from Israel and the United States.

Bar-On screened excerpts from the BBC-TV film Children of the Third Reich, which is an account of the initial meeting of that group. At one point in the film, when the group members discussed their individual stories, a German woman told of her pain in learning that her father was a mass murderer. The camera then moved to the face of one of the Jewish women whose eyes were filled with tears of sympathy. Later, the Jewish woman, whose parents survived but whose extended family members were all killed, said she was amazed that she was able feel empathy for the German woman.

Another Jewish participant said, "When I and others write of the impact of the Holocaust, we write about the lost love of all our relatives who perished; but isn't it the same for these Germans, who have also lost love?"

Halifax opera captures artistic life at Terezin

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX – Jo Stern wasn't going to let her project be hindered by the perceived small size of Halifax.

"When I heard about the opera The Emperor of Atlantis, and how Viktor Ullman composed it while incarcerated in a concentration camp, and then how it was smuggled out, I wanted to present it here," she told a small gathering at Beth Israel Synagogue's Breakfast Club.

The opera played at Dalhousie University Nov. 11, 12 and 14, with Symphony Nova Scotia conductor emeritus Georg Tintner conducting and former University of Ottawa theatre program head Tibor Egervari directing.

But Stern and her committee of half a dozen enthusiasts did not stop there.

They also assembled an extended art, lecture, cinema and video series, tying in the cultural life of Terezin and other parts of eastern Europe to the opera.

"Terezin had a flourishing artist and music community," said Stern.

"The artists in the group worked on German mapping and planning by day, but at night, they scrounged whatever materials they could and depicted life in the camp. These works, by children and adults, were smuggled out and will be shown here."

Art exhibits have been held since Sept. 12 while film screenings began in mid-October.

At the synagogue breakfast, Egervari said the Halifax production of The Emperor was a new one, done from scratch.

The six cast members were from Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, Boston, and Germany. Blaine Hendsbee and Heidi Maegerlein, were trained at Dalhousie and Acadia universities, respectively.

Egervari saw The Emperor of Atlantis when it was presented in Ottawa two years ago. After attending a conference in Munich on Art and The Shoah he was determined to direct the opera.

"I want to remind people, harshly, of the surrounding conditions, barbed wire, explosions. But we want to make sure this work is presented as a work of art."

He praised the efforts of Ullman and the other artists and musicians at Terezin, calling their performances acts of courage.

The Emperor of Atlantis was also performed in Wolfville and Antigonish, N.S., Fredericton, N.B., and Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Stern said the project took nine months to assemble "but it should have taken two years. It was hard work but we had lots of help. And the community response so far has been great."

Dueck applied to immigrate to Canada in 1948

was never a member of it or of the local auxiliary police.

Noel said the government's Notice of Revocation did not include an allegation that Dueck was a collaborator, but rather specifically referred to his service as a policeman.

Noel also found that at the time Dueck applied to immigrate to Canada in July 1948, he likely was never personally screened by an RCMP security officer.

"The evidence does not establish the type of uniform practice which would allow one to conclude that [Dueck] was requested to complete a Canadian form elucidating his occupation over the prior 10 years," Noel wrote.

"Given the known influx of immigrants to Canada from Europe in 1948 and the pressures placed on the RCMP not to impede the flow of immigrants, it is likely that the rigorous screening procedure in place was not always followed. This is particularly the case where 'filling the boats' was a known priority," Noel wrote.

At the time, agricultural workers were in high demand and some underwent a paper screening in which they were simply required to fill out form documents. Prior to 1953, those documents did not request particulars of wartime military service, Noel pointed out.

In addition, Noel found that in mid-1948 there was no "blanket prohibition" against the immigration to Canada of Nazi collaborators, though members of the Nazi party and the SS were excluded.

Little attention paid to his character

Jack Silverstone, legal counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress, said Noel seemed to "extend in a very generous way the benefit of the doubt to Dueck, in terms of interpreting the evidence against him... He could easily have found that Dueck was a member of the police, not just a translator...The judge reached conclusions that were highly favorable to Dueck."

Silverstone said much of the case "turned on the credibility of the witnesses and so can't be seen as binding beyond that fact situation."

Once Noel had found that Dueck was not a policeman in Selidovka, his other findings about security screening became extraneous to the decision, in legal terms, obiter dicta, Silverstone said.

The judge also seemed to pay little attention to Dueck's character, which was supposed to be a factor in determining admissibility to Canada, Silverstone said.

"Does being a translator for a police force that's conducting atrocities make you a person of good character?" he asked.

A visit with the Jews of Kingston

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Kingston is a city full of surprises for a Jewish reporter from the big city of Toronto.

For one thing, the Kingston Jewish Community Council spreads an umbrella over the unaffiliated Jews, as well as those of the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform persuasions. The unaffiliated 50 members pay $10 a year to belong. And some belong to both the Orthodox and Reform congregations

For another, it is a small city where the Jewish population, about 1,200 including 400 Queen's University students, is as large, or larger, than it ever was. For this to be appreciated, think of all the small cities and towns in Canada that once had a thriving Jewish community and now have trouble assembling a minyan.

And then there is Orthodox Rabbi Daniel Elkin, 54, a native of Montreal and the first Canadian-born rabbi the community has ever had. He rides a bicycle to his office at the Beth Israel Synagogue. His wife Gittel, who hails from New York, is a holistic healer.

If you want to talk to a real pioneer, then drop in on Faygel Cohen, a 91-year-old straight-backed connoisseur of fine arts, and lifetime volunteer extraordinaire. As the daughter of the well-loved Rabbi Jacob Gordon of Toronto, she first came to Kingston 65 years ago in a roadster (a Hupmobile), driven by her late husband, Sheldon Cohen.

Moussa Cohanim

Elaine and Walter Viner

And there is the surprising news that Kingston is just behind Victoria as the retirement capital of Canada. Retired Jews, as well as others, are drawn to this Lake Ontario community which is so well located, being handy to sons, daughters and grandchildren not only in Kingston, but in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa.

But lest you think Kingston is a veritable garden of paradise, a walk along Princess Street on a cold, crisp autumn evening will reveal a number of drifters, unemployed and young people hanging around the usual places, like they do in the big city.

And there are poor Jews in Kingston, because one of the problems the Jewish Community Council is wrestling with, is how to help those who need economic assistance.

To the outsider, the Kingston Jewish community presents a united front, because its members work at it.

Twice, motions to change the affiliation of Beth Israel from Orthodox to Conservative have been defeated, the rationale being that the steadfast Orthodox would not have anyplace to pray. The beautiful sanctuary at Beth Israel has separate seating for women and men.

The Iyr HaMelech Reform Synagogue, founded 10 years ago with 68 families (compared with 125 families at Beth Israel), holds its services in a hall at Queen's University.

According to Iran-born Moussa Cohanim, 70, a past president of Iyr HaMelech, the congregation has an equal number of old-time Kingston families and newcomers. "They come and go," said the retired physician, who practised medicine in Toronto for six years before coming to Kingston 30 years ago.

"I enjoy sailing, I like the summer and fall here, and as for the winter, you have to live with it. It's an easy place to get out of, to go to Montreal or Toronto, or south to Syracuse. It is so popular a retirement community, that we probably have too many seniors now."

Like Cohanim, Frank Lewis, an economics professor at Queen's, and president of Iyr HaMelech, said he likes life in Kingston because it is more laid back than a big city, its ecological record is good, and it has excellent health services. He has lived in Kingston for 25 years.

The intermarriage rate among members of the Reform synagogue is "fairly high," he said, but it applies to less than half of its members.

The decline in discrimination against Jews in and following World War II, opened up academic posts at Queen's, and about 75 Jews are on its faculty.

Rabbi Barbara Bortz of Montreal, is in her second year as Iyr HaMelech's part-time rabbi, and when she is not on hand, the services are conducted by lay members. Its Talmud Torah has 35 children, the highest in its history.

Some people have dual membership in Orthodox Beth Israel and Reform Iyr HaMelech because they want to pray and be comfortable in one surrounding, while supporting, in principle, the other synagogue. What a disclaimer for that joke about the Jew, all alone on a desert island, who builds two synagogues, and wouldn't be caught dead in one of them.

When Wally Viner, Jewish Community Council president, explains it to the bug-eyed Toronto reporter, he has the nonchalant air of a man who can't understand why it causes such a fuss.

A successful Ottawa-born lawyer, he has lived in Kingston for 35 years. His wife Elaine has just become president of the Kingston Chamber of Commerce, a post previously held by him. They are the chamber's first husband and wife team to be presidents.

Kingston's biggest problem, Viner said, is that it needs another 200 Jewish families so they can support their own butcher and baker.

The way in which Jews and non-Jews in Kingston get along is shown by the campaign headed by businessman Irving Rosen to plant 100 full-grown trees in the area ravaged by last winter's ice storm in eastern Ontario.

Sheldon and Faygel Cohen

Some trees have already been planted in a Kingston park. So far, $60,000 has been raised, and Wally Viner, Jewish Community Council president and a past president of the Orthodox synagogue Beth Israel, is confident the goal of $70,000 will be reached. "It has been well supported by the general community."

Tracing his ancestry back to the first Jews who landed in Quebec in the 18th century, Orthodox Rabbi Daniel Elkin, who has called Kingston his home for more than a year, does his part to promote unity. For instance, he invited students of Iyr HaMelech's Talmud Torah to help decorate the sukkah at Beth Israel, this year.

He obtained his undergraduate degree at Yeshiva University in New York, his rabbinic training at Mesivta of Staten Island, and his smichah from Rabbi Leib Baron in Montreal.

He has another connection with Kingston. His grandfather, Mark Wolf of Montreal, adopted Dr. Alfred Bader, a young survivor from Vienna, when the latter came to Canada, subsequently graduating in chemical engineering from Queen's. Bader, now an industrial tycoon, donated a castle to Queen Elizabeth, and has backed several charitable events.

"My wife and I liked the idea of coming to a small community with a good ecological track record," said Rabbi Elkin. "The quality of life here is exceptional, and the community celebrates together."

For The CJN interview, he is dressed informally, wearing a sweater over his tzitzit, as he does when he conducts business in the shul office, five minutes away from his home by bicycle. He is the principal of Beth Israel's Talmud Torah with its 30 students, ranging in age from three to 13.

He also teaches a high school class in the Talmud Torah, and is a consultant to Hillel for Queen's students, whose headquarters is on the property owned by the synagogue next door. He has also been invited to teach at the Jewish Studies Institute of Queen's.

He taught at the Hebrew Academy and the Akiva school in Montreal, and for nine years, was education and youth director at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim Westmount, with 1,640 members, where he conducted many weddings and funerals.

He and his wife visit Montreal and Toronto often to see the rabbi's parents, two brothers and a sister in Montreal, and the family of son Shalom-Zion (Sam), a Thornhill businessman. A daughter, Abbie Krupnik and her husband Alex, live in Brooklyn, N.Y.

"I don't care if the Jewish community in Kingston is bigger than the one in Moose Jaw, or anywhere else, all I know is that we live in a great place here," said Mort Abramsky, 71, a businessman whose forbearers came to Kingston 106 years ago and operated the famous Joseph Abramsky store. "I know everyone and they know me," he said.

His wife, the former Shirley Borden, comes from Glace Bay, N.S. One of their sons, Jay, is an executive of Mort Enterprises in Kingston. Another son, Leon, is in real estate in Toronto, while daughter Karen is married to Dr. Howard Conter, a Halifax physician.

In her cosy apartment, overlooking Lake Ontario, pioneer Faygel Cohen recalls the time her late husband took her out sailing shortly after their marriage in 1934. "I was terrified by the high waves and vowed never to go again."

But Cohen did like fishing and spent many a happy hour on the St. Lawrence River. They had a cottage on Deadman's Bay, the only one in the area that had lights, a fringe benefit of her husband's battery business.

Using a walker because of arthritis, but otherwise in relatively good health, this bright-eyed woman confessed that her favorite piece of art in the apartment is an abstract painting on the walls that she did herself.

Cohen has known discrimination, being turned down because of her Jewish faith when she applied to the University of Toronto library school in 1929, after graduating from the university as a social worker.

She speaks fondly of the persistence her late husband showed in courting her, even after she told him there was no way she would leave Toronto for the wilds of Kingston. "The moon will turn green but some day I'll get you to marry me," he teased her. They had a four-month part honeymoon, part business trip in Europe.

The daughter of a rabbi, she was raised in a house where her father's word was the law. "We were impressed that Sheldon's family had two cars, because we couldn't even afford one."

Why did Kingston's Jewish community thrive while so many others went down hill?

To this question, Cohen's reply came quickly: "Because the community had good leaders, like my late husband."

The voluntary work Cohen did, and still does on behalf of organizations in Kingston, reveals a deep commitment to the ideals of a unified community.

Fraternity chapter loses charter

By MARA DRESNER
The Connecticut Jewish Ledger

WEST HARTFORD, Conn. — The men of the Eta Upsilon chapter of Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) no longer have a frat to call their own. The University of Hartford chapter of the national Jewish fraternity lost its charter in October after an investigation by the national AEPi organization.

Chapter advisor and Hartford Hillel Foundation executive director David Terdiman acknowledged that the violation concerned hazing.

However, he said he was not at liberty to discuss the details because there is an ongoing investigation by the family of one of the students involved in the incident.

Jacqueline Weiner, coordinator of Greek activities for University of Hartford, said the investigation by AEPi was conducted in the fall.

"The national organization was informed. They came in, did their interviews and thought they needed to close the chapter," she explained.

Weiner considers the revoke of the charter to be a stiff penalty. "I feel there is a group of men who know they made some bad choices, who are basically good guys. I think the national organization should have worked with them to help them turn their chapter around.

"The national organization usually doesn't have much contact with their members," she continued.

"They're not here day-to-day. It's very easy for them to come in and see the bad and not see all the good."

According to Terdiman, however, the allegations were serious. "Hazing in any form is inappropriate; it's against the law and it's wrong," he said. "Whatever form that may have taken place, this chapter had to face the consequences. And this is the consequence.

"I was satisfied that when the issue of hazing came up, national took it seriously and they should be commended for that," he added.

Terdiman said that some of the chapter members were recommended for expulsion from the AEPi fraternity while those who were more cooperative with the investigation, will be considered alumni of the fraternity.

Overall, he praised the students' behavior during the investigation. "The brothers in AEPi handled themselves very well. These were serious allegations and they handled themselves admirably," Terdiman noted. "There was a lot of ambiguity. There was tremendous disappointment in the chapter."

In Canada there are AEPi chapters at York University, the University of Toronto, the University of Western Ontario, McMaster University and McGill University.

Ilan Barda, president of the Jewish Students' Union at U of T and a founding father of Tau Omega, the AEPi colony on his campus, found the news from Connecticut "appalling," he said. "AEPi doesn't condone hazing, alcohol or drugs."

"It hasn't really been an issue for us," Harley Gold, president of Tau Omega, told The CJN. "There's a written anti-hazing policy in [the AEPi] constitution. The consequences are being kicked out of the chapter."

WINNIPEG — For the second year in a row, a Jewish university student from Winnipeg has become the recipient of a Rhodes Scholarship.

Sara Kreindler, who is preparing to attend Oxford University in the fall, is a fourth year University of Manitoba psychology student. She is a committed supporter of the New Democratic Party and president of the University of Manitoba New Democrats.

Kreindler, 19, was born in Israel and grew up in north Winnipeg. She graduated from high school at 15 and has won several other scholarships.

She has also won awards as a vocalist at several music festivals, performed piano recitals, written a play and has been a member of the editorial collective of the magazine, Canadian Dimension.

At Oxford, she will be studying history and English. Her long- term plans, she says, are to study either labor or international law. She may also go into politics one day, she says.

Since 1966, the University of Manitoba has been among the top five universities in Canada for the number of Rhodes Scholarships awarded. Last year's recipient was David Selchen.

Case of mystery chandelier involves intrigue, murder

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – The puzzling story of the mystery chandelier first surfaced in The Canadian Jewish News three years ago.

This extraordinary pentagonal light fixture with a Hebrew inscription on all five sides, was unexpectedly discovered in a cafe on the main street of the southwestern Ontario village of Sparta, not far from London. The lettering translated, read, "This is the donation of Nachum Katz in memory of his son, Abraham David, may he rest in peace."

Cafe owner Murray Westbrook conjectured that the chandelier dated from the 1920s, and that David Abraham may have died in combat during World War I.

Westbrook had bought the chandelier from an antique lamp dealer who had previously purchased it from another dealer in Cobourg. Nothing more was known.

After the article appeared, CJN reader Mary Teich contacted us to say that Nachum and Fanny Katz had been friends of her parents and she knew the history of the chandelier.

It was a revelation involving intrigue and murder!

The Katz family, originally from Russia, had settled in Picton, Ont., around the turn of the century.

Katz prospered in business and was active in the shul which he co-founded in Belleville, a town near Picton.

Through Teich, we located Katz's granddaughter Lillian, of Katz's Delicatessen in Toronto. Her information plus details from Eastern Ontario Jewish community sources and Royal Canadian Mounted Police files, brought to light a poignant and bizarre story.

At 20, (Abraham) David became a travelling salesman, taking orders for men's suits as he crossed the prairies by car with an assistant who we will identify as B (to protect any remaining family). David knew that B had been in trouble with the law, but agreed to give him a second chance.

In June of 1928, on a lonely road between Swift Current and Medicine Hat, B apparently persuaded David to get out of the car to check a "flat" rear tire. Slipping behind him, B hit David with a shovel, buried him in a sand dune and continued west by car to Vancouver. (This is not what B later told police, but it is what they deduced).

Back in Picton, a worried Katz, who had not heard from David for some time, received a strange telegram, supposedly from his son, saying that he had become involved with a gentile girl and could never see his parents again.

Instantly suspicious, Katz went directly to Vancouver, where by pure coincidence, he spotted B on the street. Following him until he encountered a policeman, Katz demanded B's arrest.

B, who was found to be in possession of David's car, a considerable amount of cash and engraved personal jewelry, admitted that David had been killed but insisted that a companion, "Jimmy Brown," had committed the murder. Claiming that he only helped bury the body, B led police to the grave. Katz collapsed at the site.

"Jimmy Brown" was a no-show and B was charged with murder.

Two trials were held at Maple Creek, Sask. The first was adjourned because of improper threats against B during questioning. At the second trial he was found guilty and sentenced to hang in Regina on Feb. 19, 1930.

But there was a reprieve. B's sweetheart had come across a dispatch in a local paper about one Emmett Sloan, alias Brown, who was charged with murder in a case in Sydney, N.S. She insisted that the description of Sloan matched that which B had given her of "Jimmy Brown."

B's execution was postponed while police investigated, but it was confirmed that Sloan had not been in the West when David was murdered.

B was hanged on March 11, his execution witnessed by a rabbi.

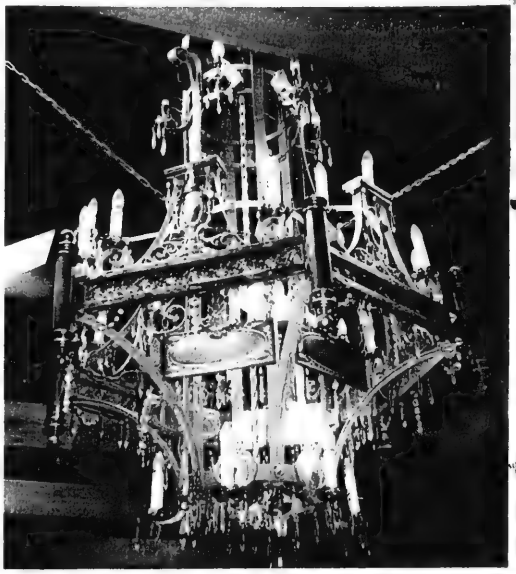
The chandelier which Katz had commissioned in memory of his son, adorned the shul in Belleville until the congregation relocated. The chandelier was then given to elderly relatives for safekeeping because Katz had died. It disappeared after the relatives themselves died, eventually reappearing in Sparta.

However, like the wandering Jew, its journey has not yet ended.

Various members of the London Jewish community were aware of the chandelier. Ellen Brownstone, fascinated by the original CJN story and its sequel explaining the mystery, had clipped and saved both items.

On a visit to Sparta, Temple Israel Rabbi Joel Wittstein and his wife, who like to check out rural Ontario tea rooms and cafes, noticed the chandelier and enquired about it. But the owner was absent at the time and the staff were not aware of its history.

The property recently changed hands and the new proprietors of the renamed Sparta Tea House, Ken and Norma Roberts, afraid that the chandelier was too heavy, dismantled it and took it down.



This striking chandelier, with its touching Hebrew inscription, was commissioned by Nachum Katz in memory of his son Abrahm David, who was murdered in 1928.

Noting the Hebrew inscription, the Roberts thought the artifact belonged in a Jewish setting. They told Shelly Siskind of London's Jewish community, about it.

Siskind brought this to the attention of Temple Israel, a Reform congregation which to date does not have its own permanent building, but is actively planning one for the near future.

The Roberts generously offered Temple Israel the handsome chandelier, which was brought to London by temple member Naomi Stambler and her son David. It now reposes in the basement of a house occupied by the congregation.

Stambler is in charge of Temple Israel's ritual committee and has been a moving force in the acquisition of Katz's unique gift to his shul.

She says that she, along with Rabbi Wittstein and the congregation, looks forward to the time when "this treasure" will rise at last, restored and shimmering, in a permanent Jewish home.

'Greater Than Angels'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Sometimes we forget – or likely never knew – that there were people who helped Jews during the awful days of the Holocaust.

In a little town in France, called Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, the entire population, led by Pastors Trocme and Thies, were involved in rescuing, hiding and sending to safety many Jewish individuals and families.

Their actions put them in very great danger, but they carried on anyway, according to reports, simply because it was the right thing to do.

Carol Matas, who has written many books for young people on the Holocaust, including Lisa, Daniel's Story and The Garden, has turned the story of Le Chambon into a wonderful book, Greater Than Angels (Scholastic Press, 1998).

Anna Hirsch, her family, her friends Rudi and Klara, and indeed all the Jews of Mannheim, Germany, were deported to Vichy France, a place that actively cooperated with the Nazis. They were all interned in a refugee camp in Gurs.

After a short while, Anna and some of the other young people, through the help of the Swiss Red Cross, were taken to Le Chambon.

In Le Chambon, they were able to lead a close-to-normal life, going to school, working on the land and having long talks about their belief (or lack of belief) in God, the nature of good and evil, and life in general.

Some of them also worked with the resistance.

They were all coming to believe that things would turn out all right, until Anna discovered that the families left behind in Gurs were forced into cattle cars and taken to concentration camps. Shortly afterwards, the Germans took direct control of Vichy France, putting the Jews in even graver danger.

Anna, who had dreamed of being on the stage, often cheered the spirits of her friends with songs and jokes.

One might wonder why the people of Le Chambon were so very brave. Part of it, Anna and her friends decide, is because they were descendants of French Protestants, the Huguenots, who had been viciously persecuted and felt no one else should go through the same thing.

Pastor Trocme tells a Nazi official, "We do not know what a Jew is. We only know men." And that is probably exactly why no one was ever turned away from Le Chambon. "Everyone in the town seemed to find a quiet way to help."

Rudi tells the others a story he had heard from his father, that the soul of man was created by God on the first day of Creation, while angels were created on the second day. "If people keep the spirit of God dominant within them they are told, 'You are greater than the angels.'"

The population of Le Chambon is without question greater than the angels.

Six Lebanese civilians wounded in IDF air strike

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Six Lebanese civilians, including a woman and her four daughters, and a Syrian soldier were wounded Sunday when Israel Air Force (IAF) planes attacked Hezbollah positions in the Lebanese Beka'a.

But the IDF does not expect Hezbollah to react to the raid by firing Katyusha rockets into northern Israel, even though leaders of the organization said they "reserve the right to react."

In the raid, F-16 fighters struck at two targets, situated close to positions held by the Syrian army, which fired anti-aircraft guns at the IAF planes.

One of the targets attacked by Israel was Hezbollah's Voice of the Oppressed radio station north of Ba'albek. The transmitter was damaged and the station went off the air.

The second target was a Hezbollah training facility near the village of Junta where an Israeli air raid on Dec. 22, missed its target and accidentally killed a mother and her six children.

In contrast to Hezbollah's militant declarations that it would react to civilian casualties by sending katyushas into Israel, the organization was more muted. "We reserve our right to retaliate in the appropriate way, time and place," Hezbollah's deputy leader, Sheikh Naim Kassem, declared.

Senior Israeli military sources said the IDF has recently stepped up its activity in the Lebanese Beka'a where Hezbollah maintains most of its infrastructure and training facilities. They are situated close to Syrian positions as a means of protection against Israeli attacks.

The IDF sources said Sunday's attack, like the recent assassination of a top Hezbollah explosives expert, was intended to get across a dual message: to show Hezbollah that it will not enjoy protection anywhere in Lebanon and to make it clear to Syria that Israel will not hesitate to operate even in areas under Damascus' control.

Israel's cabinet draws 'red line'

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In its meeting last week, the security cabinet drew a "red line" in Lebanon, deciding that Israel would respond aggressively against Lebanese targets whenever communities in northern Israel are shelled with Katyusha rockets.

This "red line" commits Israel to escalating its retaliation whenever the Hezbollah violates "Grapes of Wrath" understandings by harming Israeli civilians.

The "red line" – especially when declared publicly – reduces the flexibility of the Israeli government and its range of options. Israel would either raise the chances of escalation by an aggressive response, or lose its credibility and damage its deterrent capability by showing restraint.

The fact that Israel is entering an election period surely influenced the cabinet decision. Most of the ministers, including the prime minister, now want to appear tougher against those who attack Israel.

The defence establishment is pleased that the cabinet accepted its position against a unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon, including the gradual plan proposed by Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon. But, after the security cabinet publicly announced how Israel would respond to attacks against Israeli communities, defence officials are aware of the danger of the situation, that it could deteriorate and go out of control.

This fear was expressed during a recent meeting at Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai's office, where voices were raised against unnecessarily expanding the fighting in Lebanon. The defence establishment has no interest in initiating a breach in the understandings reached with Syria and Lebanon – and by extension, with the Hezbollah.

The cabinet announcement did not indicate which targets the IDF would hit, except that they would be in Lebanon if the shelling of Israel originated from Lebanese territory.

This means that Syrian targets located in Lebanon would not be immune from Israeli attack.

• Netanyahu denied reports that he and opposition leader Ehud Barak had reached an agreement regarding an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

• Sources reported that former foreign minister David Levy is planning to join forces with opposition leader Ehud Barak.

• Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon is reportedly considering a run for the prime minister's post. Sharon had earlier said he did not want to run. He has altered his view somewhat. "There is a difference between 'I don't want to be prime minister' and running under special circumstances," he told the press.

Chief Rabbi sounds off

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — In a recent interview with the Daily Telegraph, Chief Rabbi of Britain, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, had several somewhat unpleasant things to say about the Jewish people.

"We are a difficult people and always have been...It's still true and I wish it wasn't," he said.

Explaining how Jews were difficult, Rabbi Sacks said, "the English have enjoyed unbroken sovereignity for almost 1,000 years and because of that, they've discovered one thing above all others – to be polite...The Hebrew language has been around for 4,000 years, but it still does not have a word which means tact. Jews have spent most of their history without power, so they are good at study and quite good at prayer, but they haven't learned the arts of governance – above all, the arts of tolerance and living peacefully with your opponents.

"The characteristic English way of speaking is understatement. The characteristic Jewish way is overstatement, and that is a sign of a powerless, insecure and often persecuted people."

Rabbi Sacks also expressed regret over the level of acrimony among Jews. "If I had one wish for the millennium, it would be that I could soften some of the more abrasive edges in the relationship between Jew and Jew," he said. "I've tried hard but I've not always succeeded. We have suffered too much at the hands of others for it to make sense to inflict suffering on ourselves."

Leading members of the Jewish community in Britain told Ha'aretz that Rabbi Sacks' statements received little attention in the local Jewish press, likely because they were published amid a political crisis following the resignation of several ministers.

"This is not the first time that Rabbi Sacks has made indiscreet and harsh remarks, which to a large extent are not even consistent," a source in the community told Ha'aretz. "He has shoved himself into a marginal role in the community following the rift he created two years ago between the Orthodox and Reform movements, when he [accused] the late Reform leader Rabbi Hugo Gryn [of] ruining the faith. Rabbi Sacks even refused to attend Rabbi Gryn's funeral."

Palestinians moving, in stages, to statehood

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The Palestinian Authority is working to get the weight of the world behind the idea of a Palestinian state, and the effort is causing mounting concern among Israeli officials.

The push over the last year has occurred in what Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Dore Gold, sees as a "strategy of stages, [moving] from the phase of talking about the principles of Palestinian statehood, to a stage where they're talking about a date for Palestinian statehood, May 4."

Indeed, the Palestinian Authority has an elected government and diplomatic presence recognized throughout the world, a new airport that was visited by President Bill Clinton, and enhanced status at the United Nations, with the right to participate in General Assembly debates.

"Our people are still acquiring, piece by piece, these things we need ultimately to satisfy our dream and the people's dream of an independent state in the land of Palestine, with Jerusalem as its capital," Ahmed Karia, speaker of the Palestine legislative council and one of the architects of the Oslo peace accords, wrote in a Dec. 21 newspaper article.

In the same article, the Palestinian official may have also begun to outline the geography of that state, according to Gold.

Gold's suggestion is based on a comment made by Karia, a Palestinian moderate, in the London-based, Arab-language newspaper Al-Hayyat al-Jadida, where Karia referred to the 1947 UN Partition Plan as the basis for the legitimacy and the borders of a Palestinian state.

English excerpts of the article were disseminated by the Middle East Media and Research Institute, an organization that monitors the Arab-language press and is run by Yigal Carmon, a former Israeli intelligence officer.

In the Dec. 21 article, Karia, who is also known as Abu Alaa, spoke of "a Palestinian state, with all the rights and duties that other states possess." He wrote that the state should have internationally recognized borders, "which are the borders set in the partition resolution."

Want borders from Nov. '47 partition

UN Resolution 181, adopted Nov. 29, 1947, divided mandatory Palestine into an Arab state, a Jewish state and an international zone that included Jerusalem and Bethlehem.

The 1947 borders would have allotted nearly 60 percent of the territory to the Jewish state, more than half of which was the Negev Desert; and 40 percent to the Arab state, including the entire contemporary West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the northern towns of Acre and Nahariya.

Israel accepted the plan and then declared independence in May 1948. The Arab League forcefully rejected it, precipitating the 1948 Arab-Israeli War. The ceasefire lines after the war pretty much served as Israel's borders until the Six Day War of 1967, when the Jewish state gained control of the West Bank, Gaza Strip, Golan Heights and Sinai Desert.

Past Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations – including the 1991 Madrid Conference and the 1993 Oslo accords – have been based on UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, which called on Israel to return territories occupied during the Six Day War.

Gold stressed in a recent telephone interview that "Israel itself has stated emphatically that it won't be pushed back to the '67 borders, and certainly not the '47 borders."

The 1988 Palestinian Declaration of Independence does rely on UN Resolution 181 as a source of international legitimacy for a Palestinian state. But Gold believes Karia's comments are the first published direct reference to the 1947 borders as a basis for the Palestinian state.

The Palestinian leadership has repeatedly articulated its intention to declare statehood on or after May 4, 1999 – the end of the five-year interim period of the Oslo accords.

Israel insists that any plans for Palestinian autonomy must be decided in mutual negotiations.

The Palestinian observer to the United Nations, Nasser al-Kidwa, said through a spokesperson that Karia's comments do not represent a change in Palestinian policy with regard to borders.

The spokesperson said references to Resolution 181 serve only to reaffirm the Palestinian right to statehood.

"The international community recognized the creation of the Palestinian state next to the Israeli state at the time of partition based on the partition resolution," Karia wrote.

"That means the legitimacy of the Israeli state stands alongside and as a condition of the creation of a Palestinian state," he continued, citing several UN resolutions that, he said, are based on the resolution.

Palestinian leaders, including Arafat, Karia and al-Kidwa, have stated their desire to reach an agreement with the Israelis by the end of the interim agreement, but are firm in their ambitions to statehood.

Israel has consistently said it would view any declaration of Palestinian statehood as a "unilateral action" outside the peace negotiations, Gold said, and that it would react with "all necessary steps, including the application of Israeli rule, law and administration" to the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"Israel has talked about secure, defensible borders," Gold said. "We're willing to compromise," but the borders must be negotiated, "not thrown out ahead of time.

"This doesn't look like compromise," he said. "It looks like moving the goal posts."

U.S. policy is evolving

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The photograph signalled a seismic shift in the United States' evolving relationship with the Palestinians. It showed a grateful, beaming Yasser Arafat clasping President Bill Clinton's right hand in fulsome appreciation.

Published last month, the picture was taken immediately after Clinton addressed the Palestine National Council in the Gaza Strip, an idea originally proposed but now rued by Israel.

In his speech, Clinton, the first American president to visit the Palestinian autonomous areas, endorsed the "legitimate rights" of the Palestinians and declared that they "now have a chance to determine their own destiny on their own land."

With these carefully chosen words, delivered after the Palestinians completed the process of annulling the clauses in their national covenant calling for Israel's destruction, Clinton moved one step closer to endorsing Palestinian statehood. The timing was significant, coming just days after politically beleaguered Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warned Arafat to drop plans to unilaterally declare a state on May 4, the expiry date of the Oslo accords.

It was a far cry from the days when the United States, in deference to Israel's wishes, had no official ties with Arafat and considered the PLO a terrorist organization.

And for those with long memories, Clinton's very presence in Gaza stood out in sharp juxtaposition to two milestones which once defined Washington's attitude toward the Palestinians. In 1979, Andrew Young, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations (UN), was forced to resign because of unauthorized contacts with a PLO representative. Some years later, a UN session on the Palestinian question was moved from New York City to Geneva because the United States refused to grant Arafat the simple courtesy of a visa.

For all the symbolism associated with Clinton's meeting with Arafat in Gaza, Washington is still lukewarm about the concept of Palestinian sovereignty. Last June, the United States sided with Israel in the PLO's successful bid to upgrade its status at the UN. And in July, Clinton said that statehood should not be declared unilaterally by the Palestinians but should be an outcome of final status talks with Israel.

Looked at in perspective, American policy toward the Palestinians has evolved in stages.

During the early 1970s, before the PLO shed its radical image, the Central Intelligence Agency maintained a secret channel to the PLO. In 1975, Henry Kissinger, the American secretary of state, promised Yitzhak Rabin, the Israeli prime minister, that Washington would not recognize or negotiate with the PLO until it embraced UN Resolution 242, accepted Israel's right to exist and renounced terrorism. The pledge was contained in a memorandum of understanding linked to an Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula.

On Dec. 14, 1988, following Arafat's acceptance of these conditions, the United States opened a dialogue with the PLO. On the instructions of Secretary of State George Shultz, the U.S. ambassador in Tunisia, Robert Pelletreu Jr., launched a series of discussions with senior PLO representatives. Its ostensible purpose was to promote a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute. Israel opposed the dialogue.

On June 20, 1990, President George Bush suspended it after the PLO failed to condemn a foiled May 30 raid mounted by Palestinian hardliners on the Israeli coast.

In March 1991, in Jerusalem, Secretary of State James Baker met with 10 Palestinian leaders who had close ties to the PLO.

In September 1993, after Israel and the PLO recognized each other, the United States resumed its dialogue with the PLO. In May 1996, several months after Palestinian suicide bombers killed 59 Israeli civilians, Clinton hosted Arafat at the White House.

Since then, Washington has funnelled $500 million worth of aid to the Palestine Authority and promised a further $400 million for development projects, thereby deepening its ties with the Palestinians.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 28

• Israel accused the Palestinian Authority (PA) of acting in bad faith when it freed Hamas leader Sheik Ahmad Yassin from house arrest. "The release of Yassin proves that the PA is quietly acquiescing to Hamas activities," a government spokesperson said.

Dec. 29

• Israel threatened to block incoming flights into the new Palestinian airport in the Gaza Strip if its officials are prevented from inspecting the planes. The threat came after Israeli officials were not allowed to inspect an Egyptian plane carrying Yasser Arafat.

• Members of the Third Way party said they would push for a bill that would make it more difficult for Israel to withdraw from the Golan Heights.

Dec. 30

• An Israeli soldier, Staff Sgt. Ohad Zach, 19, was killed and two others were wounded by "friendly fire" in south Lebanon. In related events, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told protesting parents of soldiers killed in Lebanon that the Inner Security Cabinet will soon make a decision regarding Israel's presence in south Lebanon.

• President Ezer Weizman urged opposition leader Ehud Barak and former army chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak to join forces to unseat Netanyahu in the upcoming May elections.

Dec. 31

• The Knesset passed a law barring human cloning. The law carries a penalty of two years in prison for anyone violating the ban.

• Israel has the highest birthrate, 21.2 per 1,000 people, among developed countries, according to Children in Israel, a newly-released statistical book. The review also found that Israeli children spend an average of four hours per day watching TV.

Jan. 1

• Israeli and U.S. legislators are forming a committee to monitor international efforts to return property taken from Holocaust victims. MK Avraham Hershson of the Likud and U.S. Rep. Ben Gilman will head the committee.

Vichy officials profited from Jewish assets

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Members of France's pro-Nazi Vichy regime, who profited from the sale of looted Jewish assets, were protected from prosecution after World War II, according to documents from the French Finance Ministry's archives.

The daily newspaper Le Parisien, which obtained the files, reported that some Vichy administrators received a 10 percent commission from the sale of buildings and businesses confiscated as part of an effort to rid the French economy of Jewish influence.

The documents belonged to a man named as Prof. Terroine, a former member of the Resistance appointed to run an office established after the liberation of France, to deal with restitution.

The revelations came just after France was bitterly criticized at the conference on Holocaust-era assets, held recently in Washington, for moving too slowly on returning paintings and other artworks seized from Jewish families during the war.

Nearly 2,000 paintings sent back to France from Germany at the end of the war are still in the possession of state-run museums, and President Jacques Chirac said recently that the paintings must remain in France.

At the same time, a body appointed in 1996 by former Prime Minister Alain Juppe to investigate the whereabouts of seized Jewish assets, is facing resistance from banks, insurance companies and other state agencies in handing over their archives from the period, sources said.

Jewish community leaders have voiced criticism that insufficient resources and the lack of cooperation by financial institutions are hindering the Matteoli commission from conducting its inquiry effectively.

The documents found by Le Parisien tell of Terroine's anger at pressure by local politicians to turn a blind eye to the wartime activities of property administrators.

"Everyone knows that the [commission] they received increased their wealth, which was often very modest at the beginning, by a considerable amount," Le Parisien quoted a note from Terroine as saying.

"Most of them accepted their responsibilities to make a profit and help the enemy," he went on.

Musician's debut CD is surprisingly refreshing

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Like any aspiring musician, Mike Freedman would like to turn pro and make it big someday. However, he doesn't intend to sell his soul to do that.

"I don't write songs with the intention of writing a hit, or become an overnight success," Freedman, 30, says.

Freedman has just independently released an eight-song CD Mother Earth.

"(On Mother Earth) I was trying to write a concept that reflected who I was. I wasn't writing with the intention that this or that song will be a hit."

Mother Earth is a surprisingly powerful debut. Refreshingly void of pop cliches and annoying dance rhythms, Mother Earth takes the listener on an uplifting journey through the trials of everyday life.

The songs deal with the environment, emotional pain, personal happiness and struggling with different emotions. With each song, he manages to find a positive side.

Freedman describes his electric folk-rock songs as "honest, heartfelt and soulful. My songs are inspired by a particular emotion or event." On Mother Earth, his guitar playing is complimented by a team of musicians and back-up singers, giving his songs a strong, radio-friendly sound.

Listening to his bluesy nightclub voice and Eric Clapton-like guitar licks, I found his songs bear an uncanny resemblance to Canadian singer-songwriter Robbie Robertson.

I only found out later that Freedman lists Robertson – along with Bruce Cockburn, Joni Mitchell, and Peter Gabriel to name a few – as major influences in his music.

Freedman said he's also influenced by jazz, blues and roots music. When I interviewed him he was listening to a Cuban CD. "My musical influences are very eclectic," he admits.

He attributes sounding like Robertson to a combination of his vocal range and his inspiration.

"I've got a similar vocal tone to Robbie Robertson and Peter Gabriel, so I tend to sing like them. Because I listen to and sing along with their CDs, I do tend to emulate them, but in the end I was looking for my own sound, not trying to sound like anyone else.

Freedman, a music instructor by day, is currently trying to promote his CD by playing live and sending out tapes in search of that deserved major-label deal.

"In Canada that's very difficult, so I'm going to spend the first year promoting the CD on my own and build a track record. I plan on pursuing festivals this summer and try to promote my CD to radio stations."

Freedman can be seen playing at downtown clubs either as a solo act or with a full band.

Freedman is also very versatile. He studied classical and jazz, finishing third in a jazz competition. He composed the score for a CBC documentary, Kuwait in Flames, and composed theme music for the YTV production Friday's Child and commercial jingles.

To order his CD, call 416-923-0885, or e-mail [freedman@sympatico.ca].

A woman of many talents

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Life is a cabaret – and a ballet, a play, a television special, a movie soundtrack and a family affair for Judith Lander, critically acclaimed singer, composer and actress.

Born and raised in Winnipeg, Lander says, "I was painfully shy as a teenager, until Sara Udow, a well known Jewish teacher and choir mistress at the Rosh Pina Synagogue encouraged me to sing."

In 1966, Lander moved to Toronto to study radio and television arts at what is now Ryerson Polytechnic University. Within a year of her big move, the French radio department of CBC hired Lander to sing in French on a number of broadcasts for Montreal audiences.

Soon producers for CBC's English radio and television shows jumped on the bandwagon.

By the time she was 20, Lander's sensuous voice was filling both the English and French air waves.

In no time, she shared the stage with such great Canada musicians as Moe Koffman, Guido Basso and the late Hagood Hardy.

At 21, Lander joined the company of Jacques Brel is Alive and Well and Living in Paris. By 1970, the critically acclaimed Canadian production and cast moved to Boston. Lander later performed Jacques Brel with the original American cast at Carnegie Hall in New York.

Lander spent the next four years commuting between the three cities. She took a sabbatical from Jacques Brel to perform with Lotte Lenya, in a tribute to Lenya's late husband, German Jewish composer Kurt Weill.

In New York, Lander met and collaborated with choreographer Lynne Taylor-Corbett. While Lander sang her lyrical compositions, ballets choreographed by Taylor-Corbett were performed simultaneously on stage.

Their projects included Where We Are Now, and Diary as well as Spy, which was based on the Anais Nin novel, A Spy in the House of Love. It is the only work to which Nin granted performance rights during her lifetime. Spy will be remounted with the Ballet Pacifica in California this spring.

In 1979, Diary won the silver medallion at the Jacksonville International Dance Festival. Lander has accompanied the dancers performing Diary throughout the world.

American Ballet II, the Hubbard St. Co., the Atlanta Ballet, and the National Ballet of Canada are among the dance companies that have included Diary in their repertoires.

EVERYTHING'S COMING UP MOSES

The life of Moses, the central prophet of Judaism, contains mysteries wrapped within enigmas. But whereas the current Dreamworks movie Prince of Egypt tries to smooth over all the problematic aspects of Moses' life, a new book by Jonathan Kirsch blessedly makes no such attempts at reductionism.

Instead, Moses: A Life focuses on all the conundrums and contradictions surrounding the time-honored tale of the Jewish exodus from Egypt, as led by the only figure in biblical literature known to have confronted the Almighty face to face.

Why did God send an angel to slay Moses? Why did Michelangelo and other artists portray him with horns coming from his head? Why was Moses forbidden to enter the Promised Land, and where was he buried?

Using midrashic as well as many secular sources, Kirsch presents a multi-faceted exegetical study of Moses for popular consumption. Author of the previous biblical literary work, The Harlot by the Side of the Road, Kirsch, no Harold Bloom or Northrup Frye, offers no truly piercing insights.

He's more of a popularizer, who has integrated information from many sources in order to present an articulate, reasoned, yet at times unsettling view of the reluctant, all-too-human hero of the Exodus. Although fragmented and repetitious, Kirsch's portrait is also frequently intriguing. (Ballantyne Books, $38.50).

In the Spotlight: Ruth Mather was a young woman of 20 when she answered this classified advertisement in a Toronto newspaper: "Doctor's receptionist, typing experience and references essential. Call Dr. Carlen – RA 6245 for interview."

Wanting a position in the medical field, she applied for the job and was hired in November 1947. She spent the next 44 years working for Dr. Sidney Arthur Carlen, the first Jewish physician to practice cardiology in Toronto.

Now retired, Mather recently published The Doctor's Office, a fine, warm-hearted memoir of life as a medical receptionist. The book contains many interesting vignettes and highlights the progress of both cardiac and medical care in general in Toronto.

The little hospital

At first, Carlen would refer patients needing hospitalization to Mount Sinai, the "little hospital" at 100 Yorkville Ave. From August 1953 on, his patients went to the "new" Mount Sinai on University Avenue. Mather relates episodes involving both institutions, as well as the former Jewish Old Folks Home on Cecil Street. In the process she mentions numerous Jewish doctors of note.

Mather paints a loving portrait of her employer as a stern and highly ethical practitioner who always gave the best possible treatment to both rich and poor. She writes with understanding and compassion of the doctor's numerous Jewish patients, especially Holocaust survivors.

In the days before OHIP, many patients were delinquent in their accounts, and Mather's tales of several unexpected visits she made to collect overdue payments are well-told and humorous.

Published by Abbeyfield Publishers, The Doctor's Office: A Secretary's Memoir is available for $17.95.

Several Israeli classic movies now available on home video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israeli videos have always been difficult to obtain in Canada, possibly because of our relatively small market and possibly because of the difficulty in negotiating distribution agreements with Israeli sources.

Whatever the reasons, a new source has opened up recently. Sisu Home Entertainment Inc. in the United States and CHV Communications Inc. in Canada have recently released several Israeli videos. Most are feature films and several are "classics" of Israeli cinema.

Kazablan was a hit stage musical that was made into a film in the early 1970s. Featuring Yehoram Gaon, Israel's leading singer/actor, the movie quickly became a landmark in Israeli film history.

Often described as the Israeli West Side Story, Kazablan's story is just an excuse for its superb musical score. The film focuses on Kaza, a Moroccan Jew who leads a gang of ruffians through the streets of Jaffa. A war hero, Kaza is a tough guy with a soft heart who just wants a little respect.

Kaza falls in love with a young blond girl whose family comes from Poland. Her parents oppose the match and this sets off the film's main conflict. Kaza gets to sing several beautiful songs, beat up the villain and win the hand of the young lady.

Kazablan is a lovely film, although its clothing and dancing styles are somewhat dated. But it marked an important landmark in Israeli cinema as the first Israeli film to be shot with the American market in mind.

Each scene was shot twice, once in English and once in Hebrew. And one of the songs was nominated for a Golden Globe Award for best song. The video is now available in the Hebrew with English subtitles.

Another excellent film being released on video is Operation Jonathan, also starring Yehoram Gaon and also filmed in separate English and Hebrew versions.

Operation Jonathan is considered the best film about the Entebbe rescue. Gaon plays Jonathan (Yonatan) Netanyahu (whose younger brother is now Israel's Prime Minister).

Yoni, as Jonathan was known, was living with his family in the United States when he turned 18, and he returned to Israel to satisfy his military obligation.

He served as a paratrooper and was discharged in early 1967. While waiting to enter Harvard University, the buildup to the Six Day War began. He returned to his unit and was wounded in the battle for the Golan Heights.

After a few years at Harvard, Yoni returned to Israel and enrolled in Hebrew University, but the ongoing conflict during the War of Attrition led him back to full-time military service.

By 1976, he headed one of the IDF's top commando units and when the government decided to attempt a rescue of the Jewish hostages at Entebbe, Uganda, Yoni led the strike force which attacked the terminal building where the hostages were being held.

Almost all the hostages were rescued unharmed, but a Ugandan sniper in the airport control tower managed to shoot Yoni in the back and Yoni died shortly thereafter.

Operation Jonathan is an exciting action film made in cooperation with the Israeli military and government, with some of the real hostages playing themselves.

Four newer features are also being released on video:

Newland is the story of a young girl who survived the Holocaust and arrived in Israel hoping to find the family she lost. She is placed in a temporary refugee camp, and the film depicts the struggles she and her fellow refugees endured during the early years of Israeli statehood.

Over The Ocean is a delightful comedy about an Israeli family in the early 1960's. The father believes he can improve his financial future by moving to Toronto, but the rest of the family opposes the move. Milly Avital, from Stargate and Kissing A Fool, is cast as the troublesome teenage daughter.

Another film now available is the Israeli comedy The Battle of the Chairmanship.

All the films are in Hebrew with English subtitles and can be obtained from local video stores or directly from CHV Communications Inc. at (416) 633-9079.

1980, Lander starred for two years in the cabaret I'm Getting My Act Together and Taking It on the Road.

She later returned to acting and singing in New York, co-starring in the off-Broadway production of The Baker's Wife in 1985.

Married to Jovan Vuksanovich, an internationally known billiards instructor, Lander took time off in 1986 after the birth of their son Kalan.

From her home base in Toronto, she continued to collaborate with such Canadian artists as Karen Kain, Bruce Harvey and Toller Cranston.

Later credits include the theme song for the CBS Tom Hanks movie, Mazes and Monsters, which she co-wrote with Hardy, as well as songs she created for children's singer Fred Penner.

Her latest ballet composition, Journey, which starred Evelyn Hart, prima ballerina of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, was broadcast on Bravo! last fall. The television program has been sold internationally, Lander says.

She is looking forward to her seventh appearance at the Chicago Opera House where she will perform Diary with the Hubbard St. Co. in March, she says.

"The first of a quartet of songs in Diary, called To Sarah is dedicated to my mentor, Sara Udow," Lander notes.

According to the American magazine After Dark, "Lander possesses not only the rare quality of singing the very heart of the song, but better yet, the rare talent of singing into the heart of the listener."

RCMP museum, park grounds highlights of Regina

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

REGINA — In their haste to see prime Canadian destinations like Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, tourists, native and foreign, usually overlook Regina, Sask.

I don't blame them. Until a family reunion brought me here in the autumn, I, too, ignored Regina.

Having visited this snug prairie city hemmed in by a virtually endless expanse of monotonously flat wheat fields, I wouldn't exactly describe Regina as a scintillating place.

It clearly lacks Montreal's joie de vivre, Toronto's cosmopolitanism and Vancouver's physical beauty.

So what's left, you may ask?

Two attractions which rightfully deserve the appellation unique – the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) museum, which extols the development of our national police force, and the Wascana Centre, the world's largest urban park.

Found on the sprawling grounds of the RCMP's training academy, the Centennial Museum is one of Saskatchewan's foremost tourist attractions, and admission is free.

Apart from the maple leaf and the loon, the enduring symbol of Canadian nationhood is probably the steadfast, ramrod-stiff Mountie, with his peaked tan cap, scarlet tunic, gold-striped black trousers and high brown boots.

But when the RCMP was created by Parliament in 1873 under the name of the North-West Mounted Police, the Mounties, as I discovered, originally wore a rather prim black and white pillbox hat.

And today, in deference to ethnic sensibilities, Sikh members are permitted to don blue regimental turbans.

I also learned that the original mandate of the force was to eliminate the whiskey trade and establish peace and security on the Western frontier. Among its duties since then has been the battle against organized crime.

The museum, which requires at least 30 minutes of your time, highlights the glamorous and the mundane.

Finding the Mounties dashing, Hollywood studios churned out a skien of films romanticizing their exploits. The movie posters, advertising B-grade films like Call of the Klondike and North-West Trail, greet you at the entrance. They tend to be on the lurid side.

A medley of visually arresting and melodramatic posters touting the RCMP's lore are located further inside the bowels of the building. Courage of the North and Trail of the Yukon, among others, are within a hair's breath of a 1935 letter from movie mogul Louis B. Mayer thankful for the force's assistance and advice in the making of Rose Marie.

And around a bend from Mayer's missive is a replica under glass of the RCMP's last dog patrol in April 1969.

On a more prosaic level, visitors will bump into a collection of ceremonial uniforms and of firearms and cannons; the handcuffs worn by Metis rebel Louis Riel after his capture and arrest; the dour portraits of RCMP commissioners; the war medals amassed by its men in various overseas wars; and the names of the original members of the North-West Mounted Police.

The Wascana Centre, a green 930-hectare oasis set around an artificial lake, is not only a park, but the seat of the provincial government and a repository of local culture.

Completed in 1912, the legislative building is an architectural masterpiece combining the stylistic touches of English Renaissance with elements of Louis XVI.

The architect was obviously fond of marble. The imposing rotunda, beneath the dome, is constructed of Swedish marble, while the main stairway is fashioned of Canadian marble. Marble from Italy, Vermont, Ireland and Cyprus was used on the walls, the floors and the stately pillars.

In terms of progressive social welfare reform, Saskatchewan's legislature ranks up there with the best of them. Tommy Douglas, the premier from 1944 to 1961, was the first in Canada, and indeed in North America, to introduce medicare, a pension plan and bargaining rights for civil servants.

After you've seen Parliament, you should head for the Diefenbaker homestead, named after Canada's 13th prime minister, John Diefenbaker.

Filled with memorabilia of his life, the homestead is a simple house Diefenbaker helped his father build near Borden, Sask. in 1905. Moved to Regina, it was restored and dedicated in 1967 by Diefenbaker himself.

Also worth visiting is the Royal Saskatchewan Museum, which traces the history and culture of the province's native peoples through 12,000 years.

Film launches season

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — The Toronto Jewish Film Society launches its 21st season Jan. 10 with the local premiere of the controversial docudrama Don't Touch My Holocaust by director Asher Tlalim.

This frank discussion of the Holocaust won the 1994 Israeli Best Documentary prize.

"It's a profoundly interesting film," said Jewish Film Society chair Ethel Teitelbaum. "Certain things will displease and excite our audience. It forces people to think."

The film documents different interpretations of the Holocaust that have been presented in plays by the Akko Theatre Company, an Israeli group known for producing works about politics and the Holocaust.

"We [the committee] thought long and hard about showing it," Teitelbaum said.

Dr. Alain Goldschlager of the Holocaust Library at the University of Western Ontario will introduce the film, which will be screened at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. at Jackman Hall at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Other films to be presented this year include Lee Grant's Tell Me A Riddle (Feb. 14); David Vaisbord's Mischa and Joyce Borenstein's The Colors of My Father (March 14) and others. To obtain a complete list of screenings call the Bloor Jewish Community Centre at 924-6211.

Teitelbaum said the members of the selection committee are "all film nuts. We all have in our heads a huge storeroom of films we've all seen."

She said films are selected based on different criteria, including whether the audience will be interested in the subject matter and whether the film has any historical value.

Except for the Jan. 10 opening, all screenings take place at 5:15 p.m and 7:45, although the later shows are sold out. Membership tickets cost $45 (for eight screenings) and individual screenings cost $7.50.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fifth annual Purim Art Contest .

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 25. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 11, 1999. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 18, 1999.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 25, 1999. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Business Profile

Cineplex Odeon CEO oversees theatre expansion

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Allen Karp sits down to watch a movie in his corporate screening room, he mixes business with pleasure, a luxury few can indulge.

"I enjoy my products," he said, a serene smile creasing his face.

Karp, who usually screens three to four movies a week, is chairman and chief executive officer of the Toronto-based Cineplex Odeon Corporation, Canada's largest film exhibitor.

With Karp at its helm, Cineplex has been in a gung-ho expansionist mode of late.

In a strategic initiative designed to enlarge its franchise and keep the competition trembling, Cineplex is building state-of-the-art multiplexes (theatres with 12 or more screens) and megaplexes (a dozen or less) and expanding and renovating existing theatres.

In the interest of shedding unprofitable properties, Cineplex is also closing a clutch of theatres.

Within five years, he estimates, Cineplex will have about 1,000 screens in six provinces, compared to 800 in 133 locations today.

"It's a growth industry," allowed Karp, a 57-year-old lawyer who joined the company in 1986 and who rose to his present position in May 1998, following a merger with Sony's Loews Theatres Exhibition Group.

The amalgamation created Loews Cineplex Entertainment Corporation, which operates 2,900 screens in more than 450 locations in major North American cities and in Spain, Hungary and Turkey.

As a result of the merger, Cineplex Odeon Corporation became a Canadian subsidiary of the new entity, about one-third of which is controlled by the Bronfman family.

For now, Karp has no plans to expand the chain to Israel. "I'm friends with the two main exhibitors in Israel, and they're extraordinarily aggressive and successful," he explained. "So we have not made a move into Israel, and don't see it happening in the near future."

He paused, adding wistfully, " I have to admit it's a wonderful market."

In North America, growth in the industry is being fueled by massive investments on the part of both exhibitors and motion picture studios.

Theatre chains, including Famous Players, Cineplex's chief competitor, are on building sprees, constructing elegant new theatres, like Toronto's Grande and Silver City, with the most modern amenities and conveniences.

"People are going out to the movies more frequently because of these wonderful theatres," claimed Karp.

The numbers tell the story. In 1997, viewers in the greater Toronto area spent approximately $91 million on tickets at Cineplex outlets. As of November 1998, excluding the Christmas rush, the figure had increased to $101 million.

The momentum is also rooted in the fact that far more movies are being cranked out by Hollywood and independent studios these days. For example, 159 films were released by the big studios in 1996, in comparison to 143 in 1995.

These trends have had a positive effect on Cineplex's bottom line. "We're having a very strong year," said Karp, a slim, compact, casually-attired man who was interviewed last month at his spacious and airy office in mid-town Toronto. "It's been a good year at the movies."

Allan Karp

It hasn't always been so.

In 1995 and again in 1996, Cineplex sustained net losses running into the tens of millions of dollars. As serious as this sounds, consider this: red ink threatened to sink Cineplex altogether in the late 1980s.

"We were certainly a candidate for bankruptcy," conceded Karp.

Cineplex, founded by Toronto entrepreneurs Nat Taylor and his protege, Garth Drabinsky, grew tremendously after its launch in 1979.

As the debts piled up and the return on equity fell, investors grumbled. And when Drabinsky tried to wrest Cineplex from the American entertainment conglomerate MCA, he was ousted unceremoniously, prompting him to establish Livent Inc. (which itself has fallen on hard times).

Karp, whom Drabinsky hired in 1986 as a senior executive vice-president, prefers not to discuss his former boss. "It would be inappropriate for me to comment," he said.

But after Drabinsky's ouster, Karp embarked upon a mammoth cost-cutting campaign to improve cash flow, reduce astronomical debts and satisfy shareholders.

"I shut off all the leaky taps," he said.

In his bid to retrench, Karp cut administrative expenses, ordered layoffs, instituted economies, sold off assets and restructured management.

Yet, after having shaken up Cineplex, Karp quickly realized that the nation-wide recession gripping Canada could destroy all his efforts at consolidating the company.

The recession, combined with the discovery that Cineplex was still vastly under-capitalized, led Karp to the conclusion that he could best stabilize the situation and stimulate growth by finding a compatible partner.

As it happened, he was the right man for the job, having been a specialist in mergers and acquisitions before joining Cineplex. After an arduous search, Cineplex hooked up with Sony's Loews Theatres Exhibition Group, an American firm. By all accounts, the match has benefited both parties.

Before joining Cineplex, Karp – a graduate of the University of Toronto who was called to the Ontario bar in 1966 – practised law with Goodman and Carr. On the side, he lectured on taxation, corporate and commercial law.

Karp's involvement with the motion picture exhibition business took shape in the mid-1970s, when he represented a Canadian client in the purchase of Odeon Theatres from the Rank Organization.

In rapid succession, he was invited to join the board of Canadian Odeon Theatres, then was asked to be Cineplex Odeon's outside corporate counsel.

Karp, who was president and chief executive officer prior to last year's merger, is a movie fan par excellence. His current favorites are two foreign films: Life is Beautiful, a dark Italian fable cum-satire on the Holocaust, and Elizabeth, a bracing British biopic about a long reigning queen.

In the past, Karp has enjoyed, among others, Patton, The Great Santini and Star Wars. "I like quality pictures," he said.

A member of the board of the Canadian Film Centre, Karp has a special place in his heart for Canadian films.

He is cautiously optimistic that great Canadian movies can be made, though he is fully aware of the difficulties homegrown filmmakers face in finding distribution and marketing support.

Putting his money where his mouth is, Karp makes a point of buying Canadian movies. "My policy is to give every Canadian film from a recognizable distributor proper play."

About six percent of Cineplex's films are Canadian-made, although Karp says they account for less than two percent of the company's revenues.

An avid sailor, skier, golfer and motorcycle rider, Karp is the scion of Polish immigrants. His father, David, was a tailor. His mother, Mollie, was a housewife. They immigrated to Canada in the mid-1920s.

Karp's older brother, Fred, now retired, was chief executive officer of Speedy Muffler King Inc.

Karp's wife, Sharon, a former administrator of the National Council of Jewish Women, volunteers for the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the Hospital for Sick Children.

The Karps have three married daughters -- Debra, who's involved with the Toronto Jewish Film Festival; Amy, who's a jewelry designer and manufacturer; and Melanie, who's a job counsellor at the Jewish Vocational Services.

A UJA activist who was formerly chair of the lawyers and entertainment divisions, Karp has led fund-raising drives for the Weizmann Institute and the Hebrew University.

Diabetic refuses to let illness interfere with lifestyle

Josh Feuer

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When graduate student Josh Feuer, 24, was diagnosed with Type 1 diabetes at the age of 12, he refused to let his illness interfere with his active lifestyle.

Heavily involved in sports, the Winnipeg native, now a strapping 6-foot-1, became an expert in fitness and nutrition as a means of "staying healthy," he said.

"I always did a lot of reading on nutrition and personal training. I have always been involved in some sort of physical activity or competitive sport because of my history of diabetes."

Currently pursuing a master's degree in epidemiology at the University of Toronto, and working in research on diabetes for the Ministry of Health, Feuer is also a professionally certified trainer, predominantly based at Epic Fitness. He recently shared some of his expertise on health and fitness with The CJN.

Feuer advocates the use of a personal trainer for maintaining motivation and interest in a fitness program: trainers know how to vary routines to keep the workout from becoming boring.

They also ensure safety, and improve the efficiency of the workout, he said. "Personal trainers know how to target problem areas so you can meet your goals a lot faster. You're working harder. You're doing things properly and with proper moderation. A knowledgable trainer will be able to push you just the right amount so that you're getting a safe, effective and efficient workout."

But pushing doesn't suit everyone. Trainers have to be sensitive to the varying needs of individual clients, he said. "Every program is tailor-made. No one has the same ability or the same goals. I have trained people of all ages – from 17 to 60."

Personal training generally includes resistance, aerobics and flexibility training, Feuer explained. "The ratio is different for everybody."

Resistance training using weights is suitable for adults of all ages, and is especially beneficial for women 40 and up who are more at risk for developing osteoporosis, he said.

As they age, their bones become more brittle and less dense, and are more prone to fracture. Resistance training, supplemented by flexibility and aerobic training is one of the most effective ways of increasing bone density, he said.

Resistance training also improves posture by strengthening the back muscles which support the spine, he added.

Working with weights allows a trainer to isolate muscles; for example, the biceps can be strengthened by doing curls with a dumb-bell, while the bench press will benefit the chest and triceps Feuer said.

You are constantly changing the exercise to stimulate the muscle in different ways, he said. "You see gains quickly, but you do reach a plateau. You have to trick the muscles at that point by hitting them in new and different ways."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I do a lot of baking but always feel guilty about the amount of oil, butter, shortening and sour cream being used. How can I cut back the fat?

A. There are many great low-fat substitutions. I have tried using many of these as fat replacers. Try using yogurt instead of sour cream, two egg whites instead of one whole egg, applesauce or buttermilk in place of butter or oil. My advice is to try cutting the fat back by half at first and using a replacement for half only. If you find the result is like the original, try cutting back a little more the next time. Sometimes eliminating all the fat just doesn't produce as palatable a product.

Q. I recently bought some olive oil labelled "light," thinking that it was a lower fat variety. My friend tells me it actually is not. Is this a fact?

A. Yes. Most likely the oil that you purchased is 100 percent fat, as all oil is. The light claim probably pertains to either color, weight or taste, not the fat and calories.

Q. I was wondering if you would know where the best place is to store apples. I prefer my apples at room temperature but find that they don't stay fresh as long as when refrigerated.

A. I also prefer my fruit at room temperature. However, your observation is accurate. Apples will last much longer and get soft less quickly when stored in the fridge. I usually purchase small amounts to avoid having the apples spoil.

Russian Communist takes aim at 'Zionists'

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Fanning the already smoldering flames of anti-Semitism in Russia, the leader of Russia's Communist party has declared in a manifesto that the "spread of Zionism" is "one of the reasons for the current catastrophic condition of the country."

But at the same time, Gennady Zyuganov, the leader of Russia's largest party, condemned anti-Semitism, drawing a distinction between Jews and Zionism, which he called "a blood relative of fascism."

The manifesto was released in response to a request from President Boris Yeltsin's administration and the Russian Justice Ministry, which wanted to clarify the Communist party's position on anti-Semitism.

But the document's release has only heightened concern about anti-Semitism in Russia and increased international condemnation.

Indeed, UN Watch, an affiliate of the World Jewish Congress, called on the UN high commissioner for human rights to denounce all members of Russia's Communist party who made anti-Semitic statements.

And Jewish leaders in Russia expressed their outrage at the document, which they said was written in the spirit of the 19th-century canard, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

The document is the latest in a series of anti-Semitic developments that have plagued Russia since the economy began to deteriorate sharply earlier this year – along with Yeltsin's health.

Two Communist lawmakers, Albert Makashov and Viktor Ilyukhin, made several anti-Semitic remarks in public; a lawmaker known for her support of Jewish causes was assassinated; and anti-Semitic literature and graffiti appeared in at least two Russian cities.

In a move underlining the seriousness with which the government takes these incidents, Yeltsin's chief of staff convened a meeting of top security and defence officials last week to discuss the situation and the related problem of political extremism.

The manifesto released last week "declares anti-Semitism as the official policy of the Russian Communist party," said Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt. "No one is going to question anymore what ideology this party represents," he said.

"This is clearly an anti-Semitic position," said Mikhail Chlenov, president of the Va'ad, an umbrella group of Russian Jewish organizations. "Zyuganov has shown the most ugly prejudices of anti-Semitic mythology."

But despite the tone of the document, one Russian newspaper said the distinction made between anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism would likely mean less pressure will be brought by the Yeltsin administration to crack down on the Communist party.

A leading Moscow daily wrote that the Kremlin may not be fully satisfied with the way Zyuganov tried to quell the scandal over anti-Semitism by playing with the words Zionists and Jews. But Vremya-MN said that by making the distinction, Zyuganov reduced the possibility of federal authorities placing political and legal pressure on his party.

In the document, Zyuganov said the only difference between Zionism and Nazism is that Hitler attempted to subjugate the world openly, while Zionists, "appearing under the mask of Jewish nationalism, act secretly."

He added that the public attention paid to these remarks by members of his parliamentary faction were attempts on the part of the Russian media to stir up ethnic tensions to divert attention from Russia's current economic problems.

The manifesto did not make specific mention of the anti-Semitic remarks made by Makashov and Ilyukhin. Instead, Zyuganov equivocally referred to "hasty remarks by some Communists that run counter" to the party's position on the national question.

Zyuganov wrote that, according to his party, Jews in Russia have three options: leave the country, live in Russia as members of the Jewish community while considering Russia as their "only motherland," or assimilate into the ethnic Russian population or any other ethnicity living in Russia.

During the years of Soviet rule, authorities often drew the same distinction between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism that Zyuganov made in the manifesto.

From the late 1940s, the Soviet propaganda machine worked hard to spread the myth of a worldwide Zionist plot. The campaign was especially intense after 1967, when the Soviet Union severed diplomatic relations with Israel.

The situation changed in the late 1980s, during the rule of Mikhail Gorbachev. Still, Zionism remains a topic to avoid for many Russian media outlets, and recent opinion surveys showed that the majority of Russians do not have an understanding of Zionism.

"Zyuganov has clearly demonstrated the ignorance of the Communist leadership, which lacks an elementary knowledge of history and politics," said Tankred Golenpolsky, founder of the Jewish weekly newspaper Evreyskaya Gazeta.

The manifesto was issued shortly after the Kremlin vowed to crack down on anti-Semitism and political extremism.

Recently, representatives from the Main Military Inspectorate and the Security Council were sent to several Russian regions to check whether Yeltsin's instructions on combating political extremism and ethnic intolerance were being followed.

Serbs want share of Sarajevo Haggadah

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A priceless Jewish artifact has become the object of a tug of war between Bosnian Serbs and Muslims.

The 1995 Dayton Accord ended the civil war that broke out in Bosnia in 1992, but long-simmering ethnic tensions remain, and now they are focused on a Jewish manuscript known as the Sarajevo Haggadah.

Written on bleached calfskin, the Haggadah dates back to the Jewish presence in Spain before the Expulsion in 1492.

Citing the Dayton Accord, which divided Bosnia along ethnic lines, Bosnian Serbs – who make up about one-third of Bosnia's population, but control nearly half of the territory – are seeking a one-third share in the treasure.

While not asking for the Haggadah to be physically dismantled, they are demanding that it be exhibited every third year in Banja Luka, capital of the mini-state carved out for Bosnian Serbs after the war.

The manuscript is currently held in the vault of the National Bank in Sarajevo, the seat of the Bosnian government.

According to the Bosnian Serb argument, the Haggadah should also be displayed every third year in Mostar, the unofficial Bosnian Croat capital.

Jakob Finci, who heads what remains of the Bosnian Jewish community, believes the manuscript should stay where it is, saying the country's Serbian and Croatian populations showed no respect for each other's religious and cultural treasures during the civil war.

The Serbs, he points out, destroyed a 16th-century mosque in Banja Luka, while the Croats blew up the Old Bridge, an Ottoman construction in Mostar. These buildings were considered among Bosnia's leading architectural treasures.

"Now, everybody wants his own museum," said Finci. "The Haggadah is proof of the multi-ethnicity in Bosnia. It is a testament that even in the worst of times, other people's values were not destroyed."

The Haggadah, which was carried by Spanish Jews to Italy after the expulsion of 1492, was subsequently brought by a rabbi to Bosnia, which at the time was a province of the Ottoman Empire.

The rabbi's family passed it down from generation to generation until a descendent sold it in 1894 to the National Museum in Sarajevo.

During World War II, a Nazi general demanded that the Croat and Muslim curators of the museum turn the Haggadah over to him. The curators saved the manuscript by saying they had already given it to another German officer.

They subsequently smuggled the Haggadah from the museum and turned it over to a Muslim preacher, who kept it hidden under the doorstep of a village mosque until the war's end.

The Haggadah was then returned to the National Museum, where it remained until the outbreak of civil war in 1992.

When Bosnian Serbs shelled Sarajevo in that year, the museum's Muslim director, along with members of the Jewish community, braved sniper fire to remove the Haggadah from the museum's vault and store it in its current sanctuary – the National Bank.

After the civil war's end, the Haggadah was not returned to the museum because that structure – which dates back to the Austro-Hungarian Empire – suffered heavy damage during the Bosnian Serb shelling of the city, and has not since been rebuilt.

Elite gymnasts work through painful injuries

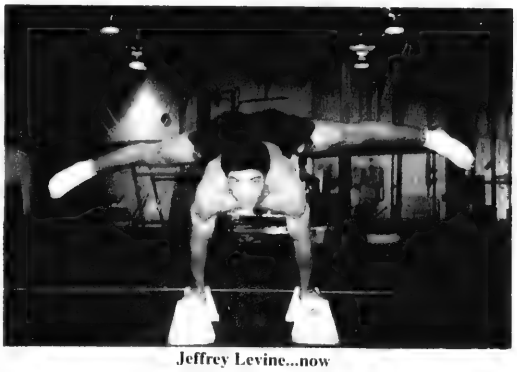
By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With his ultra-flexible physique, languid movements and balletic posture, you wouldn't think a gymnast like Roy Asaria would sound as tough and hard-nosed as a football lineman. Asaria is the type of gymnast John Madden would like, somebody who can ignore an injury and grind it out.

"I love the pain," Asaria, 16, said recently. "It's part of gymnastics. It's a sport. You've got to work through it."

Asaria was referring to his "crooked spine," the result of a missed landing during one of his exercises, and the wrist tendinitis he suffers from as a result of overworking the joint.

Putting aside the pain, and performing, has been a major ingredient in Asaria's competitive success. Recently, all his training and hard work paid off as he shrugged off a sprained ankle and walked off – make that hobbled off – with a sixth place finish overall in the Elite Canada competition in Burlington, Ont.



Jeffrey Levine...now

Competing against athletes one to three years older than himself, Asaria turned some heads and put himself in good shape for the Canadian Nationals in May. Points garnered at the two events go towards determining the national team.

His teammate and fellow athlete at the Vaughan Gymnastics club, Jeffrey Levine, managed a fourth place finish overall in Burlington, while winning the gold in the rings event.

Both boys have qualified for the Canada Winter Games, which will be held in Corner Brook, Nfld. in February.

At 17, a year older than Asaria, Levine has racked up his share of championships and medals, going back to his debut in the sport at nine, when he won the provincial championship in the Under-12 category. And like Asaria, Levine has had to fight his way through his share of injuries, which he sloughs off as a price that must be paid. Last fall, he broke his foot, and he's suffered torn cartilage in his shoulder and a back injury caused by stress.

The injuries haven't slowed him down much, if his high finishes are any indication.

At the Nationals in Hamilton last year, he finished fifth overall. Later in the year, he travelled to a meet in Vienna and came in second in the 1981 Division, for those boys born that year.

In 1997, Levine managed a third place finish at the Under-17 national championships and in the summer he finished fifth overall at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

More recently in Burlington, Levine rode a strong showing in his best event, rings, to a fourth-place finish. Unfortunately, his worst event, pommel horse, held him back, though he managed to improve by five points over his showing earlier in the year in Hamilton.

Evaluating his strengths and weaknesses, Levine said he usually does best in rings because "I'm strong. I have good balance and of all the events, rings is the one I have the greatest understanding to get my body to do it."

As for pommel horse, "It's coming along."

Like Levine, Asaria is "very pleased" with his results in Burlington. "It's my first year of junior," he said. "I've never competed with these guys before. I didn't think I'd do as well as I did. I impressed myself."

Though they both attend the gifted students program at Thornhill Secondary School and work out at Vaughan Gymnastics under coach Bob Carisse, they part company when it comes to their best events. Unlike Levine, who would rather cut out his gizzard than go on the pommel horse, Asaria excels at that event. At the Canada Winter Games trials, he finished second in that even and fourth in T-bars.

Both boys devote enormous amounts of time to their sport, usually working out six days a week. And like two peas in a pod, they both say they plan to continue in the sport during their college days. They've set their sights on a gymnastics career that will occupy them to their mid-20s, with perhaps a trip to the Olympics to cap it all.

Soccer game anti-Semitism

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Special to The CJN

ROME — The president of Rome's Jewish community is calling on local Jews to react to an outbreak of anti-Semitism that took place during a soccer game recently.

Sandro Di Castro made his pitch following a match between arch-rival teams Roma and Lazio, during which fans displayed banners deriding the other team's fans with anti-Semitic slogans.

"Auschwitz is Your Homeland, the Ovens are Your Homes," read a banner unfurled in the stands by Lazio fans.

Roma fans in turn displayed an anti-Semitic sign that used Nazi and Holocaust imagery.

"We've been fighting against this for years but we don't get anywhere. It's high time to put an end to it," said Vittorio Pavoncello, the Rome Jewish community board member in charge of sports activities.

Occasionally during the past 10 years, soccer fans in several European countries have used racist and anti-Semitic slogans to denigrate their opponents.

The Inside Back

מאת: יעל זליגר

שברים שלמים מאת: רות בונדי, תוצאת גוונים.

רות בונדי, עיתונאית, חוקרת וביוגרפית העניקה לנו בשברים שלמים דגם מעולה של ספר שמאחוריו אישיות מופלאה.

יותר מכל היא מחמירה וממעטת בערך עצמה; "אני כמו בונצה שווייג, אבקש רק לחמניה עם חמאה וקץ למלחמות..."

About families

Dear Susan:

My husband has been unfaithful to me several times during our marriage. I have always worried about the impact of this behavior on our daughter, who is 21. Recently, I have noticed her becoming increasingly angry and agitated with her father as the Clinton affair has progressed through the media. Any helpful hints?

Dear Reader:

The American public is divided on how to deal with President Clinton's transgressions. The public seems to be at odds with its elected representatives, and the media is having a field day rehashing every detail and speculating endlessly as to the ultimate outcome.

However, lost in the political and media feeding frenzy is Chelsea, the president's daughter. She is arguably the biggest victim in this national crisis. She leads a public and protected life, and while she may strive for normalcy, her personal struggles will take place in the merciless glare of the public eye.

You wrote of your concern for your own daughter who is roughly the same age as Chelsea. Your daughter may be in the process of developing her own professional career, and she may or may not be in the midst of a serious relationship.

What seems to be clear, however, is that she has little patience for her father, and this lack of patience has been exacerbated by the Clinton affair. You may want to explore what has prompted your daughter's behavior towards her father. Is it his reaction to the Clinton scandal or her growing awareness of her father's sexual improprieties?

It is imperative that you not shut your daughter down by avoiding the issue. If she is angry with her father, she should have the opportunity to express that anger directly to him. Your daughter may also be angry with you for putting up with his behavior for this long.

Prepare for a bumpy ride. Your daughter may feel that her stake in the outcome of this situation has been ignored, and that she has been left to fend for herself. Take heed, and remember that you are still a family, and that you must deal with the situation as a family.

Susan Leventhal is a psychotherapist with 20 years of experience.

Cultists worry British authorities

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — British police have warned Israeli diplomats based here of a possible attack by members of a Denver-based doomsday cult whose leader is hiding in England.

The cultists may be planning a terror attack disguised as the work of Islamic fundamentalists, police said.

Monte Kim Miller, the leader of the Concerned Christians cult, is believed to have entered Britain on the pretext of conducting research at Oxford University.

Fourteen members of the sect Miller leads returned to Denver over the weekend after they were deported from Israel.

Acting on information provided by the FBI, Israeli officials tracked the cultists for several months before launching raids earlier this month on two of their homes in the Jerusalem area.

The cultists were planning violent actions during the coming year, in order to try to bring about the second coming of Jesus, Israeli officials charged.

The 14 cultists surfaced in Israel after Miller and more than 70 of his followers disappeared from their headquarters in Denver last September.

Some of the disciples are said to have accompanied Miller to Britain, while others are reported to be in Mexico and Greece.

Israel and Britain have been sharing information in an effort to track the movements of the cultists. British officials were alerted to Miller's presence in England after the cult members arrived in Jerusalem.

Miller, a 44-year-old former business executive, has reportedly instructed his followers that he speaks the word of God and that they will die if they do not serve him.

Pluralism minefield

Yaacov Ne'eman

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

One year ago, a committee headed by former Israeli finance minister Yaacov Ne'eman was putting the finishing touches on what was billed as a historic compromise over the conversion crisis in Israel.

It aimed to usher in a new era of dialogue between Orthodoxy and the liberal streams of Judaism, and to start a process of reconciliation between Israel and Diaspora Jewry.

Analysis

The compromise was designed to avert the Knesset's adoption of a bill that would codify into law the Orthodox monopoly over conversions to Judaism performed in Israel.

It called for the establishment of an institute in which the three major streams of Judaism would be involved in preparing candidates for conversion, while leaving the actual performance of the conversions under Orthodox control.

But one year later, that compromise appears destined to become no more than a historical footnote.

Although the institute is preparing to open, the compromise proposals were never accepted by Israel's Orthodox Chief Rabbinate. The liberal movements will participate, but without the rabbinate's endorsement, Reform and Conservative leaders in Israel fear graduates of the institute may never have their conversions recognized.

Instead of dialogue, the apparent failure of the Ne'eman committee's compromise has sent both sides in the religious pluralism campaign back to the battlefield – which is now being waged on two fronts.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Meetings With Diplomats

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) recently held meetings with the Russian, Jordanian and Turkish ambassadors to Canada. The meeting with Russian ambassador Vitaly Churkin was a follow-up to a letter in which CJC expressed concern over anti-Semitic comments made by a Russian politician. Jordanian envoy Samir Khalifeh and CJC exchanged ideas on Middle East peace prospects, while Congress extended congratulations on the 75th anniversary of the founding of modern Turkey to Turkish ambassador Erhan Ogut.

Pact With Palestinians

OTTAWA — Canada could sign a free trade deal with the Palestinian Authority (PA) as soon as next month, reports said last week. The deal would be separate from the Canada-Israel Free Trade Accord, which came into effect two years ago. Officials with the Canada-Israel Committee are watching developments carefully for signs that a deal with the PA would not confer the status of an independent state.

ISRAEL

Israel Delays Flights

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials last week delayed the departure of two flights from the Palestinian airport in the Gaza Strip. The officials charged that the PA had not lived up to security arrangements for the airport's operation.

Peres Backs Barak

JERUSALEM — Former prime minister Shimon Peres announced he is backing Labor leader Ehud Barak over centrist candidate Amnon Lipkin-Shahak for the prime minister's job. Acknowledging that Shahak could draw votes from Barak in the May 17 vote, Peres said he believed that Barak nonetheless has the best chance of unseating Benjamin Netanyahu. Meanwhile, the latest public opinion polls show Netanyahu would be defeated by Barak if national elections were held last week. The poll, published in the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, also showed support slipping for Lipkin-Shahak.

Amir Seeks Move

JERUSALEM — Yitzhak Rabin's assassin has petitioned an Israeli court to move him from solitary confinement and ease other prison conditions. Yigal Amir, who is serving a life sentence for the 1995 assassination of Rabin, also asked that he be moved to a jail with other religious inmates and that he be allowed to meet once a month with his brother.

Egged A 'Monopoly'

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court has ruled that the Egged bus cooperative is an illegal monopoly. The public transport concern cannot block the entry of private companies into the field, the court said.

Shortwave Service Begins

JERUSALEM — Israel Radio has launched an English-language news program on shortwave radio, in a bid to reach North American audiences. The four-minute broadcast can be heard at 7:30 p.m. eastern time at 7495 kilohertz.

Canadians To Be Feted

NEW YORK — Three prominent Canadians will be among 21 North American women to be honored later this month by State of Israel Bonds. Bella Cohen of Montreal, Dr. Cheryl Greenbaum of Hamilton and Karen Morton of Toronto will be honored at a tribute dinner Jan. 24 at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in Palm Beach, Fla.

Bronfman Fellowships

ALBANY — Applications are being accepted for the 1999 Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel. Now in their 13th year, the fellowships offer a chance for 26 students entering Grade 12 in the fall of 1999 to spend five weeks in Israel this summer, where they will take part in seminars, explore Jewish texts and meet with prominent literary and political figures. Applications may be obtained by contacting the Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel, 17 Wilbur St., Albany, N.Y., U.S.A., 12202; phone, 518-465-6575, fax, 518-432-8984 or by e-mail at yfi@bronfman.org.

Castro Visits Shul

HAVANA — Cuban President Fidel Castro visited a Havana synagogue, where he mingled with 200 congregants during Chanukah celebrations last month. Castro spent about two hours in the synagogue and participated in the lighting of Chanukah candles, according to officials of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which has been helping the 1,200-member Cuban Jewish community for more than 30 years. Community leader Jose Miller told CJC officials that Castro expressed his admiration for the Jewish people and spoke out against racism.

French Block Monet

PARIS — French authorities are preventing an oil painting by Impressionist Claude Monet from moving to a London exhibit because it is believed to have been looted by the Nazis. Currently on loan to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Waterlilies has been claimed by the descendants of a prominent Jewish art collector in prewar Paris.

Police to Patrol Jewish Institutions

MOSCOW — Russian Jews have worked long and hard to avoid the attention of authorities.

Now they're asking Russian officials for help.

In response to a request from the Russian Jewish Congress, which is alarmed about the rise in anti-Semitism since the country's economy collapsed last year, Russian police will provide special security measures for Jewish institutions in the Moscow area.

Beginning this month, as a result of an order by Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov, Jewish institutions in Moscow will be patrolled around the clock by a special police task force. They include all four functioning synagogues in the Russian capital, Jewish schools, Moscow's Jewish theatre and the office of a Jewish weekly newspaper.

According to Luzhkov's office, the mobile police units will also provide security measures for several cemeteries in the Moscow area that have Jewish sections.

Luzhkov has personally experienced the rise in extremist behavior that has hit Russia in the past six months. In December, he was threatened by the leader of the Russian National Unity after he banned a meeting of the group, the country's largest ultranationalist group.

Internet provider shuts down racist Web site

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The reappearance of a racist French-language Web site, apparently originating in Quebec as a link to a white supremacist site in the United States, has underscored the difficulty of controlling dissemination of hate propaganda on the Internet.

The site, headed Nationalistes Quebecois Aryens (NQA) and containing anti-Semitic material, was discovered in August by the Toronto-based Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies.

The site's service provider, Montreal-based TotalNet, at that time shut it down, after Wiesenthal Centre director Sol Littman wrote Premier Lucien Bouchard that the NQA was using the Internet to spread "racially hateful material of the vilest kind."

The site calls upon French Quebecers to preserve their culture by not intermarrying or associating with other people. It also makes specific attacks against Jews, including citing purported passages from the Talmud that give Jews licence to treat gentiles as animals.

The site's home page carries a 10-point disclaimer that what follows is not hate propaganda and is lawful in Canada. "This site contains personal opinions...The author is not neo-Nazi and does not encourage genocide or racial wars." It's signed by the initials D.L.

The NQA is not a known organization, and the source of the site is under investigation by the Surete du Quebec. The identification Ressources Patriotiques Euro-Quebecoises also appears on the site.

Last month, the site was found "mirrored" in 14 Words Press, a white supremacist publication put out by David Lane, who has been in prison for the past 10 years serving a 190-year sentence for his role in the murder of radio talk show host Alan Berg. Berg had used the airwaves to denounce extreme right-wing groups in the United States.

The "14 words" refer to Lane's battle cry: "We must secure the existence of our people and a future for white children."

The site propagates what it calls "Wotanism," the "will of the Aryan nation," and calls for the immediate establishment of an exclusively white nation.

The NQA site is no longer accessible through 14 Words, having disappeared soon after news reports of its existence.

On one page of the NQA site, 35 purported quotes from the Talmud are listed under "the Code of the Jew." They include the passages "The Jews are human beings, but the other nations of the world are not human, but beasts," and "The non-Jew is consequently an animal under human form, and is condemned to serve the Jew night and day."

There are directives that permit Jews to steal from, swindle, enslave, rape and even murder non-Jews with impunity.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko said this represents "a blatantly false understanding of Judaism" and said he found this sort of propaganda especially worrisome because it evokes the "classical" anti-Semitism that led to persecution of Jews over the centuries.

While he does not believe these sentiments are characteristic of Quebec nationalists, Rabbi Poupko does think "there is a fringe of the movement that is xenophobic, racist and anti-Semitic," from which sovereigntists should clearly disassociate.

The site's introduction, headed by a pair of stylized swastikas, warns against the threat of assimilation to white Christian Quebecois "founders," by foreigners. It concludes with "Vive le national-socialisme Quebecois!"

"We hope that the provincial police will be successful in finding the authors of this disturbing and offensive site," said Jeffrey Boro, chair of the community relations committee of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

"We expect that the local Internet service provider will be cooperative in providing whatever information is necessary in getting to the bottom of this material."

The incident has prompted CJC to renew its call for government to find legal avenues to control hate on the World Wide Web, including requiring service providers to adhere to a code of ethics.

"It is our opinion that the government should urge industry

We must resist

As we travel the last little piece of time on the road to the end of this century, we are seeing an increase in troubling behavior, in Israel and in Canada, on the part of some fundamentalist, evangelical and missionary churches.

That behavior of course, is aimed at us: the Jews.

Last week, Israel deported back to the United States 14 members of Concerned Christians, a Denver-based Christian cult. They had been planning to trigger some "catastrophic" event in Jerusalem to set in motion a train of events that would result, as they believe, in the second coming of Jesus.

Fortunately, Israeli security forces had been monitoring the movements of the group for some time. "They planned to carry out violent and extreme acts in the streets of Jerusalem at the end of 1999 to start the process of bringing Jesus back to life," said an Israeli police spokesperson after the group was taken into custody.

According to reports in the media, the al-Aksa mosque on the Temple Mount was one of their intended targets. Hayan Idrisi, a prayer leader at the mosque, accused the group of planning to destroy the mosque. Had the cultists succeeded, one can only imagine the conflagration that might have resulted!

The fear of extremist, religiously motivated Christian-cult violence is so severe in Israel as the year 2000 approaches, that the government has created a special security task force to keep a watchful eye on the situation.

Closer to home, in communities across North America, a different kind of Christian extremism is appearing as we approach 2000.

Missionary activities aimed at converting Jews away from their Judaism have sharply increased.

Last month, during the Chanukah/Christmas period, the Chosen People Ministries, an aggressive, well-funded group of proselytizing Christians, launched a new-look conversion campaign by taking out full page ads in prominent, high circulation newspapers around the continent, among which were the Globe and Mail in Toronto and the New York Times.

"Is it reasonable to be Jewish and believe in Jesus?" the ad deceitfully asks.

Preceding the ad by some weeks, several different missionary organizations mailed evangelical literature to more than 5,000 rabbis urging their embrace of Christian doctrine. Before that, the Messianic Times, a cleverly designed, full-color, missionary newspaper reappeared in the mailboxes of more than 10,000 households in greater Toronto.

Last week, we discovered that the Christian People Ministries had applied to register, as their own trademark, a stylized version of the menorah.

The Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada are opposing the group's application. Mark Weintraub, chair of the CJC's national community relations committee described the manoeuvre by the Ministries as "nothing short of scandalous and deceptive."

This latest tactic by the missionaries is yet another shameless assault on truth and on the concept of mutual respect. It is of a piece with the dishonesty that calls a place where Christians pray a synagogue. It is cut from the same craven, fraudulent cloth that wraps Christian teaching into "Bible studies" for young, unsuspecting Jewish children.

Rabbi Michael Skobac, education director of Jews for Judaism, the largest Jewish counter-missionary organization in Canada, reports a dramatic increase in Christian missionary groups in the past 30 years.

Jews for Judaism reports that there are more than 50 such missionary groups in Canada and more than 700 worldwide spending in excess of $225 million to convert Jews. In Toronto, there are more than 40 such groups targeting Jews.

The issue between Jews and missionary Christians is not one of theology. It is not a dispute between different interpretations of canonical text. Rather, it is very simply an issue of the deepest, most profound existential significance for all Jews, namely, the ability of these Christians to allow a world that has Jews.

James Parkes, author of the seminal work, The Conflict of the Church and the Synagogue, pointedly observed that "the rejection of Christianity by the Jewish people has always troubled the Christian conscience."

Indeed, so troubled has the Christian conscience been, it has seemed at times to have disappeared.

In 1939, the number of Jews throughout the world was approximately 18 million. In 1945, the number of Jews throughout the world was approximately 12 million. In 1999, the number of Jews throughout the world is still approximately 12 million.

As a community we should therefore be alarmed and angered at the increase in missionary activities.

The aim of all these activities, simply if inelegantly put, is nothing less than the elimination of Jews. To be sure, we are not now talking about the elimination of Jewish human beings. We are talking about the elimination of these human beings as Jews.

This is not merely a semantic difference.

We must resist the missionary efforts. "Resistance" requires knowledge and self-confidence and the determination to fight every deception the deceivers aim at us. MBD

Christian group seeks to trademark menorah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A "Hebrew-Christian" group says it won't back off from its attempt to register a controversial trademark, despite stiff opposition from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada.

Chosen People Ministries has applied to the Canadian Intellectual Property Office to register a stylized menorah as its official trademark. The group has used the semi-circular menorah as a logo on its stationery and newsletters for years.

But CJC has filed a strongly worded statement of opposition to the application, saying the menorah is a Jewish symbol and that the attempt to adopt it by a group that works "specifically to convert Jews to Christianity" is "scandalous and immoral."

CJC points out that the menorah "has been widely identified and used around the world (including Canada) as a symbol of the Jewish religion," and is also used as Israel's official state emblem.

Congress adds that the menorah is already used as a symbol by a number of Jewish organizations in Canada.

Chosen People Ministries, which maintains a branch operation in north Toronto, has been described by Congress and others as one of many groups which target Jews for conversion to evangelical Christianity. Central to its teachings is that it's acceptable, even desirable, for Jews to accept Jesus as the Messiah.

In its application to register the trademark, the group says it provides religious literature and information, and engages in a "ministry and mission to reach both Jewish and non-Jewish people with the gospel of Jesus the Messiah."

Larry Rich, Canadian director of Chosen People Ministries, told The CJN that his group "is just trying to get the message out."

He said the group is simply formalizing a logo it has been using, one that's been "an established part of our identity for decades.

"Registering it would give us the freedom to use it in a variety of ways," Rich said, perhaps on T-shirts and coffee mugs. "We don't want to get into a [legal] problem 10 years down the road."

Rich said he understands CJC's concerns.

"We're not out to be troublemakers. We believe that believing in Jesus is a Jewish thing to do. History has camouflaged that for the Jewish people."

Two Toronto lawyers who specialize in intellectual property, spotted the menorah last November in a journal that publishes trademark applications for the public to see.

Anyone can oppose an application for a trademark. The next step is for Chosen People Ministries to respond to CJC's challenge. The matter then goes to the registrar of trademarks for a final decision.

Mark Weintraub, chair of CJC's national community relations committee, said Chosen People Ministries' attempt to "monopolize" the menorah is "nothing short of scandalous and deceptive."

The Canadian arm of B'nai Brith, whose logo for 150 years has been a menorah, also said it will oppose the trademark application.

B'nai Brith Canada president Lawrence Hart said the use of a menorah to "attract unsuspecting Jews to Christianity...is completely unacceptable."

The development came just two weeks after Chosen People Ministries raised the ire of several community organizations with a full-page ad in the Globe and Mail, which said it's "reasonable" for Jews to believe in Jesus.

Jewish transport service will aid bedridden, disabled

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's first transport service for the Jewish bedridden is off and running.

Joseph Sahar, owner and operator of the Ahavath Achim retirement home, at 31 and 33 Wilmington Ave., has purchased a used ambulance, and turned it into a patient transport service.

The vehicle will be used to pick up and take bedridden and wheelchair-bound people to medical appointments, social events and other functions.

The service is available 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Rules and regulations prevent Sahar from calling the vehicle an ambulance, but it is allowed to rush a client to hospital should an emergency happen during a trip. On board, is emergency equipment, including oxygen.

The $14,000 van has large red Stars of David painted on the side and rear windows. "It's the first Jewish patient transport service in Toronto," says Sahar, who was once a paramedic in his native Israel.

The van will be driven by a registered nurse who speaks Yiddish, Russian, Hebrew, French and Ukrainian. "It will make people who can't speak English more comfortable," adds Sahar, who with his wife Louise, has operated the Ahavath Achim retirement home, with its 34 residents, for the past six years.

Sahar says he wants to hook up with Hatzalah, which is slated to begin an ambulance service in the Orthodox community of Toronto and York Region in the near future.

Sahar will charge a flat rate that he says is a better deal than comparable services.

CJC helps to reunite psychiatric patients, relatives

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An attempt by the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) to reunite 1,000 Holocaust survivors in Israeli psychiatric hospitals with their relatives, in Israel or abroad, is beginning to bear fruit.

A total of 300 of these survivors will be transferred from hospitals to hostels, old age homes or other non-psychiatric facilities, Israeli Health Minister Yehoshua Matza announced recently.

"This is a step in the right direction, but we don't intend to stop our efforts," said Jack Silverstone, CJC executive vice-president, from his Montreal office.

Silverstone has written to Shmuel Tsur, administrator general of the hospitals, asking if, in view of their removal from hospitals,the names of the 300 can be released to aid reunification.

Up to now, Israel has maintained that the names of the survivors are confidential under Israeli regulations.

But CJC president Moshe Ronen has advised Israel that a "case by case" release of names does not satisfy the requirements of Diaspora survivor organizations, who want all the names released. Many survivors will not come forward voluntarily until the names are available, these organizations contend.

"Now is the time to attend to any rights of these survivor patients which have been abridged, whether in compensation or otherwise," said Ronen.

The issue has become front page news in Israeli papers.

Matza also announced that a committee of inquiry looking into charges that these patients have not had access to reparations has finished its work and will report to the government.

Ronen believes the problem is not a difficult one for the Israeli government to solve, and that the "veil of secrecy" over the patients should be lifted.

"It will lead to a moral society in Israel if the government does it now," he said.

Concern about how and where the patients will be transferred from the hospitals was expressed by Gustava Weiner of Montreal, who first raised the issue with the CJC .

She said she doubted that there are resources in place to assist in the transfer and relocation of patients who have been held in psychiatric hospitals for 50 years.

But she welcomed an announcement from AMCHA (National Israel Centre for Psychosocial Support of Holocaust Survivors) that the health minister has asked AMCHA to help enhance the quality of life of the 300 patients to be transferred.

New book captures world of city's first Jewish cardiologist

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ruth Mather, who for 44 years was secretary to Dr. Sidney Carlen, Toronto's first Jewish cardiologist, has written a tribute to his pioneering and sensitive medical practice.

It is an unvarnished and historically accurate account of the Jewish doctors who started their practices in Toronto in the 1930s and 1940s, many of them after serving in World War II.

Mather's book, The Doctor's Office, A Secretary's Memoir, (Abbeyfield Publishers, soft cover, $17.95) doesn't avoid the rough spots along the way. It records that when Carlen first started his practice in Toronto before enlisting, he had so few patients that his brother Elmer used to sit in the waiting room when a patient was due to arrive.

Besides paying tribute to Carlen's skills in diagnosing heart problems (there is an excellent seven-page glossary of heart disease terms), the author also writes about the human interest stories of many of his patients, including Holocaust survivors.

She tells about the shrewd but inhumane businessman who rejected a marriage broker-arranged bride from Europe as his second wife because she had had rheumatic fever and could not work.

Though the husband denied any responsibility, the woman was given free care by Carlen and looked after by Jewish social workers.

An embittered patient who suffered a major stroke never achieved a reconciliation with his son over a disputed marriage, despite Carlen's efforts to bring the two together before it was too late.

In contrast to these sad tales, however, are the stories she tells about the patients who overcame difficulties and went on to lead healthier lives as a result of Carlen's ministrations.

Many doctors brought their problems to Carlen for consultation, among them Dr. Jules Haber, Dr. Joe Hart, Dr. Gordon Stewart, Dr. Joe Fenton and Dr Dave Axmith.

Carlen, who died in 1991 of heart disease, has two sons in medical practice in Toronto, Dr. Peter Carlen and Dr. Robert Carlen.

He emerges in the book as a devoted doctor who managed to deal with life's vexing moments, such as the time he made house calls on a patient whose pet chihuahua attacked him more than once, even ruining a pair of his best pants. The doctor did not ask for compensation, and none was ever offered.

Mather was a young secretary at the Ontario Department of Education when she answered an ad for a typist-receptionist.

In the building at 116 College St. (now the site of the Best Institute), at the end of a long walkway from the Parliament Buildings, were the offices of Carlen, Dr. I.R. Smith, Dr. A.A. Appell, Dr. L.J. Harris, Dr. M. Rotstein, Dr. D. Borsook, Dr. D. Bohnen and Dr. L.J. Cole. Mather's starting salary was $100 a month.

After the College Street building was demolished, Carlen moved his office to different locations, where Mather continued to work as his secretary until his death.

This coalition of regions can't work

Next month, the dreamers of a "united alternative" political movement in Canada will hold an exploratory convention to see if there is sufficient political will among the gathering of the diverse but unhappy regional right-wingers to coalesce into one new political party, presumably with Preston Manning as the head.

Organizers of the convention last week released discussion points for the formation of a "confederal party." As summarized in the National Post, the confederal party would be "a regionally driven national movement which could use the Reform as a western base, the Bloc Québécois as a launching pad in Quebec, the Tories in Atlantic Canada, and a united Reform-Tory force in Ontario... [T]he new party would elect one national leader and five deputy leaders responsible for representing Canada's regions and developing distinct regional policies and political organizations."

To be fair, details of the proposal were only sketchy. But as presented thus far, they appear to reach no higher than the lofty language of a business agreement cobbled together out of anger, among disgruntled, disparate departments of a large corporation. The unifying thread that ties one region of representatives to the next seems only to be the desire deep in their aching hearts to topple the incumbent Liberal government of Jean Chrétien.

There appeared to be no vision, nor drawing, nor even an outline, of the shape and the values of the country that these regionally-focused representatives would represent.

More troubling still was the question: Would anyone speak for Canada rather than for the amalgam of the regions?

Under the scheme being proposed by the United Alternative planners, the parts would never equal the sum. The parts would always be greater than the sum. There would be no house built out of widely shared sacrifice, but only a common roof under which the regions would find shelter.

The greatest loyalty would always be to one's own region, to the self-interest, to what was familiar. It would never be to a higher ideal of the wider common good, of the wider, rich diversity, of the wider striving to achieve something national.

The proof of this lies in the fact that members of the Bloc Québécois are also envisioned as flag carriers for the party. As we know, however, the Bloc members have but one allegiance. That allegiance is to the province of Quebec only. Their entire raison d'être is to remove Quebec from Canada and in the process, to remove Canada, in the sense it has always been, from Canadians.

As Michael Bliss, the renowned historian noted, "The idea that the Bloc Québécois would be the Quebec wing [of a United Alternative Party] is absolutely the kiss of death."

Courting politicians who are avowedly separatist into a political party that purports to be Canadian is not a sound strategy. Canadians intent on strengthening the country will not be attracted to vote for a party held together with prominent separatists, because, after all, separatists have no interest in strengthening the country. Their chief political interest is in dismembering the country.

What does it say about the judgment of the conference organizers that they would appeal to Canadians by putting forward a proposal that requires them to share the goals of separatists? What does it say about the proposal's chances of success? We refer again to the observations of Bliss: "If it is reduced to something like this, people might just as well stay home. Our tradition since Confederation has been one of national parties. If our politics becomes nothing but a coalition of regions, frankly I don't think that can work."

We agree with Bliss.

Survivors included in Conference decisions

D.M. Schonberger's letter (CJN, Dec. 24), complaining of the lack of Holocaust survivor participation in the Washington Conference on Holocaust assets is inaccurate. The conference itself, as he must have known, was co-sponsored by the U.S. State Department and the United States Holocaust Museum; its co-chair was the head of the museum, Miles Lerman, a survivor; the keynote address was given by Elie Wiesel, a survivor. Many of the delegates were survivors, and indeed, the leading survivor organizations were all recognized as accredited delegations, equal to each of the 47 governments who attended.

As well, it was these organizations, and not me as Schonberger claims, who sensibly recommended that the final governmental conference on the Holocaust in this century not be devoted solely to assets and compensation, but that it deal, in addition, with Holocaust education and the meaning and significance of the Holocaust in the new millennium.

It was these organizations as well – and not me – who referred to the Holocaust as the ultimate metaphor for evil, not as Schonberger mean-spiritedly and absurdly suggests to "trivialize" the Holocaust, but rather to enhance its uniqueness and to give meaning for generations to come to the murder of six million Jews.

Sulphite patient concerned by meat additive

As an unwitting victim to sulphite sensitivity caused by eating at a salad bar, which resulted in a trip to a hospital emergency department, I am appalled by your report of a conviction of a Toronto meat purveyor for adulterating ground beef to give the false illusion of freshness. Applauds new production of The Prince of Egypt

When I read Bill Gladstone's review of The Prince of Egypt (CJN, Dec, 17), I suspected that he had missed the point. And now, after seeing the film, I'm sure of it. Granted, the movie misses some plot twists. But, it would take several hours to work through the entire story. I felt that the writers did a phenomenal job of retelling this emotional tale. More than that, they added a refreshing dimension to it, highlighting the double bind that Moses must have experienced in having to harm and betray the only brother he had ever known.

Furthermore, the film revealed a more sensitive leader, one who was affected not only by the suffering of "his" people, but of all people, Egyptians included. Cecil B. de Mille's version of the story was appropriate for its time. However, in my opinion this 1998 adaptation is far superior.

Ramadan halt contrasts with Yom Kippur War of 1973

I was very impressed by the number of politicians and media types who were concerned about Muslim sensibilities if the attack on Iraq were to conflict with the holy days of Ramadan. Very commendable.

Yet I couldn't help wondering how many politicians and media types expressed a similar concern over Jewish sensibilities when Israel was attacked by Egypt and Syria on Yom Kippur of 1973, the holiest day in the Jewish calendar.

Just wondering out loud.

Against a self-imposed ghetto

I lost most of my family in the Shoah. If the only way we Jews can escape assimilation is by living in a ghetto again, albeit self-imposed, history has demonstrated that this creates xenophobia and hatred, and is a sure recipe for prejudice and persecution.

Today, we Jews live in a global village and belong to the society of which we are a part. Let us, together with all other peoples, strive to make this world a better place in which all of us can live in understanding and peace, and most importantly welcome the non-Jewish marriage partner into our midst.

Deporting the Nazis: it may be too late

By ARNOLD FRADKIN

Arnold Fradkin was a key member of the original special prosecutions unit established by the Department of Justice. He died suddenly in his home in Ottawa, Saturday, Jan. 2.

At the beginning of November 1987, a conference marking the 40th anniversary of the Nuremberg War Crimes trials, called Nuremberg 40 years Later: The Struggle Against Injustice in Our Time, was held at McGill University.

Those attending the conference included Allan Ryan, former director of the American Office of Special Investigations; New York District Attorney Elizabeth Holtzman, who, as a U.S. congresswoman, drafted the legislation that allowed for the removal of people who were involved in wartime persecution (known as the Holtzman amendment); Ray Hnatyshyn, then attorney general of Canada; and members of the then recently constituted War Crimes Unit of the Canadian Justice Department.

At the conference, Holtzman expressed grave reservations about the process that was being put into place in Canada. She warned that by emphasizing criminal prosecution at such a late date rather than denaturalization and deportation, "Canada may seriously compound the original wrong" (CJN, Nov. 12, 1987).

One doesn't have to be a seasoned criminal lawyer to appreciate her warning. If only one of 12 jurors in a criminal case believes there is a reasonable doubt, then there cannot be a conviction. A denaturalization case, however, is tried by a judge alone, and the proof is on the civil standard, which means on the balance of probabilities or a high degree of probability.

I am not saying that convictions cannot be obtained in old cases. If criminal convictions can be obtained for sex offences committed 30 to 50 years ago, then convictions can most certainly be obtained against suspected Nazi war criminals for acts committed during the same time period. It depends upon how well the prosecution is presented before the court and how the trial plays itself out.

But denaturalization proceedings against suspected Nazi war criminals and collaborators in Canada clearly have a much better chance of succeeding than criminal prosecution. That was certainly the experience in the United States.

A few days after the conference, David Matas, senior counsel to B'nai Brith Canada, sent Hnatyshyn a letter, dated Nov. 12, 1987, seeking clarification of the government's intent to utilize the denaturalization and deportation remedy with respect to alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada. A similar letter, dated Nov. 25, 1987, was sent by Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. Between the dates of their letters and Hnatyshyn's replies in March 1988, the first denaturalization case was instituted against a suspected Nazi war criminal and collaborator in Canada, Jacob Luitjens.

Within its first six months, the War Crimes Unit launched both the Luitjens denaturalization proceeding (in January 1988) and a criminal proceeding simultaneously, thereby following a two-track approach. Eventually, the criminal case was lost at trial and the Crown's appeals were dismissed. The denaturalization case against Luitjens received its successful judgment in October 1991, thereby opening the way for more denaturalization cases.

The attorney general's replies in March 1988 to Matas and Littman occurred after the Luitjens case had been launched. In his reply to Matas dated March 14, 1988, he stated: "The Criminal Code was amended to give Canadian courts jurisdiction to try cases of war crimes and crimes against humanity as defined in the legislation. That does not mean that other available legal remedies are not to be used." He added that if citizenship was obtained by fraud, then he could "see no reason why revocation of citizenship proceedings would not be instituted." He sent a similar reply to Littman dated March 9, 1988.

This two-track approach in pursuing suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada was again mentioned by the next attorney general of Canada, Kim Campbell. The May 21, 1992, editorial of The CJN reports as follows: "Campbell noted, in replying to a query from MP Robert Kaplan, that the Department of Justice is pursuing a two-track approach to suspected Nazi war criminals – prosecution under the war crimes statute and denaturalization procedures."

The pronouncements were clear. If we couldn't proceed by prosecution in a particular case, then we would try to denaturalize. It was pretty straightforward.

After the first criminal and denaturalization cases were instituted in December 1987 and January 1988, another criminal case was instituted in December 1989 and again in January 1990. However, the charges in these two criminal cases were eventually withdrawn before trial.

Notwithstanding the Luitjens decision, no cases, denaturalization or criminal, were instituted in 1991. In 1992, a criminal case was instituted instead, which never went to trial because the accused was too ill, but no denaturalization cases were instituted. No cases, denaturalization or criminal, were instituted in 1993 or 1994.

Until 1995, Luitjens remained the only denaturalization case in Canada, and until 1998, it was the only successful trial of a Nazi war criminal and/or collaborator since the program began in 1987.

In March 1994, the Supreme Court of Canada delivered its decision in the one criminal case that had gone to trial, that of Imre Finta. The acquittal was upheld.

In 1995, three denaturalization and two deportation cases were instituted. To date, there has been only one other successful denaturalization case; it was decided in 1998, seven years after the Luitjens decision. Of the five cases instituted in 1995, three of the accused died before trial.

In 1996, five more cases were instituted. Of these, one was won, the next was lost, one accused voluntarily agreed to give up his citizenship and two are awaiting judgment.

In 1997, four denaturalization cases were instituted. Two are still awaiting trial. One is in trial and one voluntarily relinquished citizenship

In 1998, one deportation case was instituted; it is awaiting trial. No denaturalization cases were instituted.

The pattern which has emerged, therefore, is that beginning in 1997, there was a decline in the number of denaturalization cases instituted each year. This might be due to the fact that the security officers who could have given evidence are no longer available.

Since the immigration forms which had been completed by the suspected Nazi war criminals were destroyed, testimony by the security officers who administered those forms and checked the information contained therein is obviously vital to prove a denaturalization case based upon immigration fraud. Swift action in bringing forward denaturalization cases is therefore crucial to success because of the advanced age of the screening officers. If the specific officers who could give this key evidence about the forms are no longer alive or well, then without this testimony and without the actual forms, it is extremely doubtful whether cases could succeed.

We moved quickly in the Luitjens case and were able to prove through a sequential chain of testimony of screening officers the high probability that Luitjens would have been refused admission into Canada had he provided truthful answers to the questions set out in the immigration form about what he did and the organizations he belonged to between 1939 and 1945. Hence the court found that he must have lied and thereby committed immigration fraud.

There have been two further denaturalization decisions since the Luitjens decision of October 1991: one on Wasily Bogutin, who was denaturalized, on Feb. 20, 1998, and the other on Peteris Vitols, who was not, on Sept. 23, 1998.

The Bogutin case was somewhat unique because, although the immigration form which Bogutin would have filled out was not available, there were available several other documents that clearly showed he had lied. There was a strong inference, therefore, that he must have lied on the immigration form, because it would otherwise have contradicted the information on the forms that were available.

This was not the case with Vitols, and the court found that the Crown had not proved that Vitols lied in a material way when he entered Canada. The only security screening officer who testified in the Vitols case about the procedure respecting the forms at the relevant time period stated that in effect, he had applied his own personal discretion in the interpretation of the criteria for admission. There were "too many inferences which have to be drawn on insufficient evidence," said the court.

An interim decision in the case against Johann Dueck (which was recently decided in Dueck's favor) was delivered in October 1998. The Crown alleged that at the time Dueck applied for his immigration visa in or about 1948, collaborators were prohibited from coming to Canada. The Crown called a former RCMP officer who was posted in London in 1951 and had no work experience with respect to security screening of immigrants in 1949. The officer relied upon what he had been told by others was the procedure in 1949. The court noted that it appeared that no security officer who was in function in 1948 or who had direct knowledge of that time is available to testify. It therefore refused to admit the evidence about 1949.

The Vitols and Dueck decisions reflect the difficulty now being faced in trying to make a circumstantial case of immigration fraud for denaturalization purposes so late in the day.

Without the actual immigration forms, testimony by the security screening officers who were actively involved at the time and place where the suspected Nazi war criminal or collaborators applied to enter Canada is critical. But increasing numbers of these officers are dying or becoming too sick to testify. Without them there may not be sufficient evidence to establish the circumstantial chain of proof that the suspected persons lied to immigration authorities.

At this point in time, therefore, not only are the actual immigration forms not available, but now, frequently, the specific officers who dealt with those forms and could testify about them are not available either. The denaturalization proceedings finally reinstituted in 1995 may simply have been too late. We will have to wait and see. Let's hope that is not the case.

Israel's election fever

The Israeli election is five months away, and at the outset of such a long election campaign, it is possible to predict only that it is impossible to predict very much.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

However, several factors underlying this early election are easier to analyze, and they reflect significant trends in Israeli politics and society.

Perhaps more than any other election in Israel's history, this one will be about leadership. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has lost the confidence of his cabinet and the Knesset primarily due to a failure of personal credibility. Policy divisions inside the cabinet, especially in the wake of the Wye agreement, play a secondary role. During the campaign, therefore, leadership is likely to be debated more than issues.

Indeed, this is the first election in Israel's history in which the historic divide between the pragmatic "Labor" approach to the territorial question, and the ideological "Herut" approach, has actually been rendered irrelevant. Once Netanyahu, as leader of Likud, redeployed in Hebron and signed the Wye agreement, the great debate that had divided the Zionist movement since its early days was decided. Those who oppose Netanyahu on the right will now form a splinter group. In doing so, they will follow a pattern that was established two decades ago, when Menachem Begin led the withdrawal from Sinai.

Then, the majority supported the compromise for peace and the opponents broke off to establish a small party. Begin's purist opponents on the right formed the Tehiya party, which acted as a strident opposition throughout the autonomy negotiations in the 1980s and the terms of two national unity governments.

Similarly, when Yitzhak Rabin appeared to be considering withdrawal from the Golan in return for peace with Syria, opponents of that potential move broke away from the Labor party and formed the Third Way party.

As a result, in spite of differences in emphasis and nuance, the historic distinctions between Labor and Likud are less significant than ever before. While each party has a committed cadre of voters, for voters in the centre, who represent the swing vote, the key issue is leadership.

Israel's crisis of confidence in the political process takes place against a broader international trend that has been described as a crisis of legitimacy for democracies. The public perceives a weakness in the functioning of traditional parties, and believes that politicians are motivated primarily by self-interest.

In Israel, the new system of direct elections for prime minister, first experimented with in 1996, was originally an attempt to restore confidence in the governance process. In practice, the two-ballot system decimated the two dominant parties and transformed the Knesset into an arena cluttered with interest groups that had become political parties. As a result, the Knesset has lost its ability to serve as a focus of solidarity and accommodation – historically the role of large parties.

Over the last two years, Israelis have seen far more polarization and fragmentation in every public policy debate. The "sectorization" of Israeli politics has exacerbated the disenchantment with existing political structures and institutions, and has unleashed a vague yearning for strong leadership that can "pull it all back together."

In such an atmosphere, the attractiveness of a new "centrist" voice is evident, if perhaps naïve. And in Israel, the cleanest, most attractive candidates for the role of the "political messiah" are traditionally ex-generals. They are non-partisan celebrities (at least until they join or form a party). This is why so many generals are courted by the different parties for top slots. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, former chief of staff, heads the list, but there are others, like Matan Vilnay, Yossi Peled and Yitzhak Mordechai (currently minister of defence in the Netanyahu government).

Along with the vote for early elections, the Knesset passed a bill to revert back to the previous parliamentary system, in which the voter votes with one ballot for a party and its leader. The bill was supported on a bipartisan basis by many Knesset members who have realized the weaknesses of the system they put in place, especially as practised by Netanyahu. While indicative of serious misgivings with the results of the latest experiment in electoral reform, the future of this bill remains uncertain. It only goes into effect for the elections subsequent to those next May, and it may not pass second and third reading in the short time left in the Knesset's current term.

In the meantime, the election of '99 will go ahead with the current system in place, and will see a proliferation of candidates for prime minister. In the old system, most of them would not have been able to qualify. All of them will run a highly personal campaign and will take full advantage of the flawed system that lets them appeal directly to the public. But more on the candidates in future columns.

A never-ending controversy

Readers of this column are by now aware that Germany does not have an official Holocaust memorial, and the structure planned for Berlin has been the subject of endless controversy.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The recent edition of The Week in Germany has the following report:

"During a debate on cultural policy, representatives of the new governing coalition and the parliamentary opposition voiced support for giving the Bundestag the final say on whether a memorial for victims of the Holocaust will be built in Berlin. State minister for cultural affairs Michael Naumann cautioned members against passing judgment on those who have voiced objections to the project. 'There is no one correct form of commemoration,' Naumann reminded the assembly. At issue, he said, is not the importance of the Holocaust as a historical event, but the aesthetic value of a particular monument.

"Born of a private initiative, and nurtured by the city and former chancellor Helmut Kohl, the plan to erect a Holocaust memorial has been the centre of controversy for several years. The design under consideration, proposed by New York architect Peter Eisenman, envisions a series of some 4,000 concrete columns spread over 60,000 square feet between the Brandenburg Gate and Potsdamer Platz. While some public figures have reservations about the design, others have begun to question the value of addressing the story of the Holocaust through a monument.

"Naumann expressed his own reservations during the Bundestag campaign earlier this year. Rather than providing the city with a 'place to lay wreaths,' he has proposed that Berlin house part of the video archive of Holocaust testimony compiled by Steven Spielberg's Shoah Foundation. Spielberg favors that idea. In an interview with the German magazine Stern, he said he envisions a centre offering meditation rooms with video monitors where visitors could call up the stories told by Holocaust survivors.

"Other critics of the memorial have argued that education, not just remembrance, should be the goal. Andreas Nachama, president of the Jewish congregation of Berlin, believes a more active way to remember victims of Nazism would be to establish a school for religious studies. The institute would promote research, not just on Judaism, but also Christian and perhaps Islamic theology, recognizing that all of these biblical traditions were threatened during the Nazi period.

"The memorial's strongest supporters include Helmut Kohl and Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany. During his visit to Israel this week, President Roman Herzog also endorsed the project. In accepting an honorary doctorate from the Ben Gurion University, he told students he hoped the Bundestag would be able to agree on a form for the memorial 'that will do justice to the enormity of the crimes and endure as a reminder for future generations."

It appears to me that the longer the controversy lasts, the more loudly will those voices be heard that want no memorial at all. They are not so much the voices of Shoah deniers but of people who say, "Enough already!" The longer the delay, the stronger their appeal.

The challenge of the holidays

The holiday season has come and gone. I am referring to Christmas, New Year's and Chanukah. It is worth reflecting on how Jews react to all three, and indeed how Canadian society has changed its attitude to them.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Christmas is not a Jewish holiday. But I can remember distinctly as a young child having some red Christmas stockings filled with small gifts. But never a tree, unlike the 20 percent of American homes with at least one Jew in them that nowadays do have a tree. I also recall sitting on Santa's knee in Eatons department store in Montreal, cleverly passing as a non-Jew in order to get one of the cheap gifts the store would hand out.

I once attended a late night Christmas Eve mass at St. Joseph's Oratory, though not to celebrate but to gawk. My father, a Holocaust survivor who worked as an office manager, first for the Yiddish paper the Kenader Adler and then for the Lubavitch yeshiva, loved singing along with Christmas carols, as much as he did with zmirot.

But nothing could change the fact that Christmas would always be alien. And in my own home today, there are no stockings and of course no trees, but rather a heightened celebration of Chanukah. Indeed Chanukah has increased its importance in Jewish religious life far beyond its theological significance, as a direct response to the seductive challenge of Christmas. It has all the important features for a successful Jewish holiday: It is child-centred, with latkes, dreidels, candles and gifts. It celebrates a struggle for freedom, which makes it universally appealing to and easily defended for non-Jews. It comes only once a year, albeit for eight days. It does not involve restrictions or onerous duties. As a result, more Jews in both Canada (87 percent to 77 percent) and the United States (78 percent to 64 percent) claim to light Chanukah candles than to fast on Yom Kippur!

New Year's poses difficult challenges for Jews. It is not religious, but Jews already have their own Rosh Hashanah. I know I will wish other Jews a Happy New Year on occasion, but it never sounds just right. So I try to avoid it, which also makes me feel silly. But Jews attend and host New Year's parties without a thought.

The responses of non-Jews to these holidays have been as interesting as the Jewish responses. Political correctness now reigns, and Christmas is in full retreat. Office parties and holiday cards now resound with the neutral Happy Holidays and Seasons' Greetings, with nary a Merry Christmas to be heard or seen. No one wants to give offense, and everyone wants to be culturally sensitive. Certainly many Christian colleagues go out of their way to wish me a Happy Chanukah. Day care centres and schools now give Chanukah (and in the United States Kwanza) almost equal time with Christmas, lest any Jews or other minorities feel offended.

My dilemma is that I am not anti-religious, or anti-Christian. I feel no antagonism, no slight, when I hear a Merry Christmas directed my way by someone who does not know me, but certainly means well. No one is threatening me with forced conversion. And I make a point of wishing Christian friends and colleagues a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year unless I know they are passionate atheists.

A Jewish colleague once told me some years ago how she took offence at Air Canada staff who would wish her, and all the passengers, a Merry Christmas as they deplaned. I wonder if Air Canada has now cleaned up its act. I would never find that offensive; maybe my skin is not thin enough.

What hurts more is to see how Christians themselves have expunged Christmas, and certainly Christ and his message, from their seasonal vocabulary. This is not surprising. Christians have also abandoned their churches in record numbers in recent decades. Weekly church attendance in Canada declined from 53 percent in 1957 to 23 percent in 1990, and church membership declined from 82 percent to 29 percent in the same period. These rates of decrease are much greater than anything facing Canadian Jewry.

First Christmas and now Chanukah face the danger of over-commercialization and of having the original message of the holidays lost in an avalanche of gifts and hype. The good news is that unlike many of their Christian neighbors, Jews are not yet too inhibited to wish each other Happy Chanukah!

Betty Goodwin: Canada's grande dame of art

Betty Goodwin, though commonly considered the grande dame of Canadian art, still seems unaccustomed to the limelight

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As she submits to yet another interview in connection with her retrospective at the Art Gallery of Ontario, which runs until March 7, one suspects she would rather be at home in her Montreal studio

Asked if she enjoys all the attention lavished upon her, she murmured, "I just go along with it."

Fame, clearly, has not gone to her head.

Single-minded and persistent, Goodwin focuses instead on the future. "I just want to push my work as far as I can," she said, a woman of 75 swathed in fashionable layered clothes and an elegant neck scarf.

Renowned for her drawings, paintings, lithographs, etchings and sculptures, all of which convey a sombre mood and a brittle spirit of mourning, Goodwin is at the top of her form.

"It is impossible to think of the history of the visual arts in Canada in the latter part of this century without recognizing her achievement, so profound has her influence been on other artists, and the general public alike," Matthew Teitelbaum, director of the Art Gallery of Ontario, writes.

A child of Romanian immigrants who did not gain widespread recognition until she hit her 50s, Goodwin has always been open to change and renewal. Virtually self-taught, she began as a painter of conventional still lifes in oil.

"I never felt really pleased with what I was doing," explained Goodwin, whose pieces are represented in all major Canadian public collections, and who was recently named the first recipient of the Harold Town Prize for Drawing, one of many prizes she has won over the years.

In the late 1960s, she broke with the past, breaking free of the stodgy formalism which had been the hallmark of her style. Embarking upon a new path, she produced a series of bold etchings entitled Vests. Making further forays into uncharted territory, she fashioned minimalist sculptural paintings out of canvas tarpaulins, and then whipped up a set of haunting, somewhat eerie drawings of distressed swimmers and disembodied phantom figures floating off into the distance.

Although she does not dwell on it, at least in a brief conversation, Goodwin's sensibility is indubitably a function of Jewish tradition, deeply ingrained grief and barely suppressed outrage at the world's injustices.

Born and raised in Montreal, she is the daughter of Abraham and Clare Roodish, a couple who settled in Montreal by way of the United States.

When she was nine, her father, a tailor and the proprietor of Rochester Vests, a modest garment factory, died suddenly, forcing her mother to take over a struggling business tossed to and fro by the Depression

His death had a profound effect on Goodwin, and as Teitelbaum observes, the Vests series suggests both a memorial to him and an affirmation of future life.

Goodwin, who lived a stone's throw away from the campus of McGill University, attended Montreal High School, where she was an indifferent pupil. "I went through 12 grades without being a great student," she recalled, conveying the impression that she would rather forget that period.

However, she excelled in the visual arts. "I couldn't do anything else better," she said. Encouraged by her mother, Goodwin honed her talents with the help of teachers who came to their home. Goodwin's mother was a budding artist herself, and after she retired, she became a sculptor. "She turned out some very, very nice pieces."

Graduating from high school, she joined Steinberg's, the now-defunct Quebec food store chain, as a graphic and layout artist. "It was an enjoyable job to a point."

In 1945, she married a dashing young man she had met at a dance. She and her husband, Martin, a civil engineer, had a son, Paul, who died under tragic circumstances in 1976 when he was 30. This loss, too, has had a lasting impact on her sensibility.

Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Goodwin exhibited at exhibitions, sometimes winning prizes. Her first major show, in 1976, was held at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts. Her second solo show, 10 years later, took place in the same venue, as well as at the Art Gallery of Ontario, the Vancouver Art Gallery and the New Museum of Contemporary Art in Manhattan.

As she developed her craft, she briefly studied printmaking with Yves Gaucher at Sir George Williams University (now Concordia University).

Goodwin works out of a converted beverage plant on Colonial Street, off St. Lawrence Blvd, redesigned by Martin Goodwin. The studio is also her home. She has high words of praise for her husband. "He has been incredibly helpful. I wouldn't be where I am without his support. And he's a very good critic."

You don't have to be a critic to realize that Goodwin's oeuvre is driven in part by her Jewish roots. "I come from a long line of Jews, and I'm very happy to be Jewish," she said.

As Teitelbaum observes, the suspended figures in her drawings are evocative of The Dybbuk, a story by Shalom Anski drawn from kabbalistic folklore.

Betty Goodwin

In addition, Goodwin has been influenced by German painter Kathe Kollwitz, whose images of the trauma of war helped her better understand the horrors of the Holocaust.

Yet, in her view, the Holocaust is not the only blight on civilization. Citing a litany of disasters which have occurred in the waning decade of this century, she referred to ethnic cleansing in Rwanda and mass famine in Sudan.

Goodwin acknowledges that she expresses her grief through her work. "It helps me cope with the incredible inhumanity in the world, though I don't expect it to change anything. We don't seem to learn a thing on this small planet. Despite technical advances, we have not advanced much. They used machetes to break up people in Rwanda."

She acknowledges that the theme of mourning is deeply embedded in her work, but in Teitelbaum's opinion, it is not confined to a certain time or place. As he puts it: "Mourning has an episodic quality, formed from distinctive memories which cascade without heed to specific chronology."

Her agent in Toronto, Jared Sable, is acutely aware of this quality. "She's an open wound," he told The Globe and Mail recently. "She feels everything."

Although she has never visited Israel, and admits that she does not completely understand the intricacies of Israeli politics, Goodwin is flabbergasted by the acrimonious debates raging over the Who is a Jew issue.

"I find it stunning that there is that kind of division in Israel after the Holocaust," she said, criticizing "Jewish fundamentalists" who expect every Jew to conform to all the rituals of Judaism.

She goes further, claiming that organized religion sows divisions under a consistent rubric: "My god is better than your god."

Calling Canada an "amazing, wonderful country," Goodwin is concerned by the spectre of separatism in Quebec. "I want to see a whole Canada," she said, but conceded that she intends to live in Quebec come what may. "I love living in Quebec."

In the meantime, she plans to keep on exploring new frontiers. "I've had a very intense and exhilarating year, and I intend to keep on going until I'm horizontal."

Problems educators face

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In Anton Chekhov's moving story, The Lady with the Lapdog, a cynical womanizer named Gurov surprises himself by falling in love with Anna Sergeyevna, whom he had first thought would be just another conquest in his life of drift. Both are married and are thus consigned to meeting secretly every few months in a Moscow hotel room.

On the way to one such rendezvous, Gurov ruminates about the paradox that his life has become: "Everything that was important, interesting, essential, everything about which he was sincere and did not deceive himself, everything that made up the quintessence of his life, went on in secret, while everything that was a lie, everything that was merely the husk in which he hid himself to conceal the truth, like his work at the bank, for instance, his discussions at the club... all that happened in the sight of all."

There are times when the Jewish educator may feel as though he is carrying on a clandestine affair with Torah. Unable or afraid to profoundly express the passion he feels for religion, and fearful of scorn or worse, indifference, he is consigned to a discussion of only the most broadly based Jewish topics, with the inevitable descent into politics or gossip that such a compromise entails: Israeli peace agreements, anti-Semitism, interdenominational relations; and the Rodney King-like mantra of Jewish unity (Can't we all just get along?).

But the educator must resist, at all costs, the slide into a religious discourse stripped of passion and even tension, despite the possible discomfort that such passion can often cause others. Occasionally there are individuals who get excited about discussions about God; or are obsessed by issues that are often the stock in trade of religion, such as good and evil (How could Hitler do what he did?). But for the most part, many people in our society do not define themselves as all that interested in religion.

They will say – somewhat sheepishly, and at times aggressively – "I'm not a religious person." And what they mean by this is some kind of stereotypical association that they have made between religion and a certain kind of lifestyle or personality.

Judaism conjures up scenes of men in beards and long black coats speaking in a foreign language. Christianity evokes images of Protestant evangelicals "performing" the Gospels in front of rapt audiences, or priests in the confessional dispensing formulaic forgiveness. And Islam, unfortunately, often becomes automatically equated with terrorist activity.

Many of the people I teach, depending on what stage of life they are at, see their path in terms of friendship, romantic ties, family, leisure activities, job, house. The current so-called "revival in spirituality," even though it may be light years away from any organized religion, barely touches them, as though it is news from a different country, one that they have heard of but feel no compulsion to visit.

The temptation, therefore, is to lower the heat, as it were, and just surrender to the lowest common denominator in order to accommodate the public's reticence about religion. Hence talk of belief in God gets supplanted by sermons about the president's fall from grace; difficult questions of religious authority and the compulsory nature of the moral life become seamlessly replaced by an analysis of the Wye accords.

Beware the Jewish educator who pretends to cultural hipness in place of religious challenge and existential engagement. As Kurt Vonnegut Jr. once noted wryly, "We are who we pretend to be, so we had better be very careful who we pretend to be."

The origins of cholent

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Want to keep warm? Then read on. Today we continue looking at the marvelous resources and recipes for cholent on the Jewish Highway.

The source of the word cholent seems to bewilder a lot of people. As with most things cholent, there are fierce disagreements about its origins. Ohr Somayach's Ask the Rabbi had a bit of correspondence on the topic [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/ask/ask070.htm#Q2].

They suggest that the name comes from the French chaud lent meaning hot-slow. R. Naftali Falk responded that the word cholent comes from the Hebrew sh'lahn, meaning "that it stayed over-night." This refers to the fact that cholent stays on the fire overnight. Whereupon Shimon Goldstein chimed in that cholent comes from the words Shul end, because in many communities, people didn't have private stoves, so before Shabbat they all put their cholent in the baker's oven. On Shabbat morning after shul finished, everyone went to the baker to pick up their cholent.

Rather, she looks at cholent as a social phenomenon [http://www.countryyossi.com/feb97/kayla.html]. "It is a known fact that in shuls where the rebbetzin serves cholent every week, there is a 100 percent attendance by men, women and children. Cholent is the glue (or should I say cement) that holds the congregants to their shul."

But who says that cholent is just the rebbetzin's domain, anyway? Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Montreal's Beth Israel Beth Aaron's Congregation discloses the recipe for his "famous" cholent [http://www.shul.org/cholent.htm]. But please note the minuscule writing at the bottom of the page: "DISCLAIMER: Making cholent is an art, not a science."

If you love cholent, but aren't crazy about beans, try a Moroccan horisa which uses wheat, onions, paprika, potatoes and NO beans [http://www.geocities.com/CapitolHill/1717/Cooking.html]. Over at Berkeley University, type in the word "cholent" and you'll get five recipes including New Orleans' cholent with cayenne pepper [http://soar.Berkeley.EDU/recipes/ethnic/jewish/indexall.html].

But the bubbe of all cholent lists can be found at the Jewish Food Archives [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/choindex.htm]. At last count, there were over 50 cholent recipes including dafina, hammin, Hungarian sole't and nyana choma. But if you are really daring, why not try out the chocolate cholent or the yogurt curry cholent!

Of course, everyone knows their cholent is best. Last year, 131 hopefuls congregated at the Dan Panorama Hotel in Haifa to vie in the first-ever National Cholent Competition [http://www.shamash.org/jb/bk980213/istrong.htm].

There was Moroccan schena, Iraqi tbit, Kurdistan hetteh and Yemeni hammin. But the 30 judges chose Esther Israel's tripolitanian spinach cholent which included chicken, beef, semolina dumplings, stuffed vegetables and spinach, and flavored with garlic, onion and a medley of herbs, including parsley and cilantro.

"I've fulfilled a dream," said Israel, a 39-year-old mother of three. "I've always wanted many people to eat my cooking, because my children don't appreciate it."

Berlin a complex man

Books
Bernard Baskin

A Life, Isaiah Berlin*, by Michael Ignatieff (Viking Press, $35).

Isaiah Berlin, British philosopher and historian of ideas who died last year, was a complex, many-sided personality and seminal thinker. Unprepossessing in appearance, he was renowned as a gifted conversationalist, and regarded as charming and intellectually elegant. During his busy lifetime, he was friend and confidant of many of the political and social makers and shakers of the day.

He was born in Latvia, and at 11, he emigrated with his parents to London. Brilliant in his studies, he became the first Jew ever elected to a fellowship at All Souls College, Oxford. He always maintained that the three strands of his life – Russian, English and Jewish – had been braided over time into the single skein of his identity.

Just before the outbreak of World War II, he was dispatched by the British Foreign Office to Washington to report on the attitude of Americans to events in Europe. He took advantage of the opportunity to meet and discuss Jewish issues with such Jewish leaders as Rabbi Stephen Wise; Felix Frankfurter; Herbert Lehmann, governor of New York; and Supreme Court Justice, Louis Brandeis. His impressions of these personalities were candid, insightful – and not always complimentary.

The people he couldn't bear, were apologetic American Jews such as Arthur Krock and Walter Lippmann, the two most famous columnists of their day, who both gave the impression of writhing inwardly at the very fact of being Jews.

Berlin's book on Karl Marx, his profound study of 19th-century Russian thought, his original and forceful ideas – especially on the subject of liberalism and freedom articulated in more than 120 essays – throw a brilliant light on many of the salient political and social issues and concerns of our time.

Michael Ignatieff, Canadian born and educated, is an esteemed author and British television personality. He spent a decade in interviewing Berlin and setting down his ideas in devoted Boswell-like fashion. The resultant biography is polished, sprightly, continually absorbing and gracefully written.

Much in the book concerns Berlin's involvement in Jewish matters. Throughout his life, he was an unswerving supporter of Zionism, chronicling some of its most crucial and least known moments as an inside observer, as well as drawing memorable portraits of some of its central actors.

Through his wide contacts, both formal and informal, he performed many acts of beneficence towards the State of Israel. Its birth against all the historical odds was for him, one of the living refutations of determinist conceptions of history, and to the degree that it remained a secular, democratic state, an unparalleled triumph of free, unrelenting moral effort.

In 1977, a year before his death, he composed a statement imploring Israelis to accept a final partition of the land with the Palestinians. Jerusalem must remain the capital of the Jewish state, but he urged that Muslims have access to the holy places of Jerusalem, and that Palestinians have a right of abode in Jerusalem under international guarantee. The alternative, he warned, was an interminable cycle of terrorist chauvinism on both sides, and savage war.

To the surprise of many, Berlin agreed to become the first president of Wolfson College, Oxford, from 1966 to 1975. He managed to cajole the Ford Foundation in the United States and his friend Leonard Wolfson in Britain to provide the necessary funds which made the college possible.

The author concludes his well-rounded life and touching portrait of this singular personality with these words "In a dark century, he showed what a life of the mind should be: skeptical, ironical, dispassionate and free."

Guest Voices

Life in the IDF

By MICHAEL KAY

Last summer, I had the opportunity to learn first hand about life in the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) by spending four weeks on the Chetz v'Keshet Summer program.

The North American students, including three Canadians, met in New York, then flew to Prague, where we stayed for a few days, and then left for Israel.

In Tel Aviv, we met the Israeli high school students who would be joining the program, and the leaders of our program who were army officers.

One reason I chose this program, was to be able to meet Israelis my age; another was to improve my fluency in Hebrew. Since I had enrolled in the Hebrew-speaking group, I had the opportunity to work and live with Israeli students.

Our first week was spent in an army base in the north, where we learned that life in the IDF is very hard. Although it varies in the different army units, many recruits routinely sleep only four hours a night. There is constant physical work, as there was for us, as students, too.

Recruits must go through many hours of physical exercise – running, weightlifting, and doing push-ups, sit-ups and more drills every day, just to get in shape before they begin their specialized training.

We were taught how to act in the face of danger, and we learned the Hebrew commands and warnings used in dangerous situations.

Our barracks were very rudimentary, with 20 hard, metal bunk-beds in a room. The food was also very basic.

Although we were based in the north, we went on long, sometimes difficult, beautiful hikes in the Galil, and for a treat, we went on a cruise of the Kinneret.

The base in the north is unique in that it has a dual training function: basic education and basic training.

As part of my cousin Tamar's army work, she is teaching some new recruits basic educational skills, such as reading, writing and math. Some of the recruits are boys who did not do well in school, and are being given a second chance to learn. Some are immigrants who did not go to school in Israel. All are being taught basic education as well as basic training; this is a double program, which is both mentally and physically demanding.

In our second week, we moved south to a housing complex near Sde Boker. The accommodations were much more luxurious than those in the north: we had nicer rooms and the food was far better.

We had the experience of loading and firing an M-16 rifle, the gun commonly used by all soldiers. The soldiers in the streets have their own M-16s for which they are responsible.

Because of the concern that terrorists could strike at any time, there is barely a minute in the day when a soldier is not carrying his or her gun strapped around a shoulder. The punishment for losing a gun is imprisonment, which reflects the seriousness with which soldiers regard their weapons.

Of course, we were well supervised, and only used the rifle on a firing range. Even in those controlled conditions, the power of the M-16 was awesome.

Our final week was spent in Jerusalem, and it was a great experience. We toured the Old City, and were saddened to see the trenches in Ramat Eshkol from which the soldiers fought for Jerusalem in the Six Day War.

Our experience helped me learn about Israel as a country, meet many great people, and strengthened my desire to go back again.

Michael Kay is a high school student in Toronto.

Socio-economic status linked to control of diabetes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The way a person responds to a diagnosis of diabetes depends, to a large extent, on their own personality and the personalities of their family members, according to a consulting psychologist at Sunnybrook Health Centre.

David Patrick Ryan, who is also coordinator for community regional health for Toronto's aged, was speaking at a recent meeting of the Jewish Diabetes chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association, held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Other determinants, he said, include socio-economic status – "wealth makes things easier" – your regular lifestyle and habits, the amount of support provided by the health-care system, and knowledge of the illness.

Diabetes is different from a disease such as rheumatoid arthritis, Ryan said. "The fact that rheumatoid arthritis can't be controlled, affects a person's psychological state."

Diabetes, however, can be controlled through careful juggling of diet, exercise, and, if necessary, medication. "The challenge is to take control of it, because if you don't, it will control you."

The issue of control is important to a great many people he said, citing as an example the person who comes upon a group of people waiting for an elevator, and promptly pushes the elevator button himself.

"If you feel that [generally speaking] you can control your world, you have to convince yourself that you are still in control," he explained.

Another example of a personality trait that could affect how one handles diabetes, is the way in which the person reacts to new situations.

"If you hold a rattle in front of very young babies, some will move towards the rattle, and some will pull away from it. Those same babies, grown up, will react in the same way to new things," said Ryan.

Similarly, those who can handle new situations will confront and deal with the diagnosis, while those who can't will deny the situation.

Using a questionnaire to illustrate his point, Ryan divided people into four categories: drivers, enthusiasts, harmonizers and analysts.

Drivers "want to get on with it. They need to know what they have to do to deal with their illness and just how to do it."

Enthusiasts, on the other hand, like to jump into new things. "They are the ones to be willing to try new techniques and fads," Ryan said.

Harmonizers like to hear all sides of an issue, and try to preserve peace, trust and good relationships. "They will be the ones who will be most concerned about others. If the harmonizer is the patient, he or she may try to protect the family from being upset; if the harmonizer is the family, he or she will be the most concerned, and the most likely to maintain an ongoing interest."

Finally, he said, the analyst wants to hear all the details and steps. "They will be the best organized, and keep the best records."

If both partners of a couple are the same, it may lead to a stalemate, according to Ryan. For instance, if both are harmonizers, "they may be so careful to avoid hurting the other person, that no one will say what needs to be done. With two enthusiasts, they are both rushing off in different directions, while two analysts are so busy getting all the facts, that nothing much gets done."

On the other hand, a combination such as the enthusiast and the analyst might be very successful, as one will keep a check on the other, who may be going off in all directions.

An analyst and a driver, both calm, cool and collected, may both be so matter of fact that there will be little effective communication about the illness.

Ryan said that there is no perfect combination. "There are strengths and weaknesses in all of them. What is important, is to recognize what each of the couple shares, and what is different...and to adapt and empathize."

The next meeting of the Jewish Diabetes chapter, March 8, will be about how a diabetic deals with Pesach.

players to organize themselves into a professional association, complete with a code of ethics and a conflict resolution mechanism," he said.

Joy Walter, who is in charge of TotalNet's "abuse" department, said the company had decided to shut down the NQA's site because it was found to be in violation of its "appropriate use" policy, which states there is "zero tolerance" of threatening or harassing material.

"It is our intention to allow TotalNet customers access to the wealth the Internet has to offer with minimal or no interference," a policy clause reads. "TotalNet believes in free speech, however, certain activities are considered inappropriate by the Internet community at large, and cannot be permitted under the guise of free speech."

Webmaster Maria Sweeney, however, noted that this remains a legally grey area, and service providers are loath to be censors. In TotalNet's case, with over 50,000 customers, monitoring the content of sites would be next to impossible any way, she said.

"In theory, we should have 100 percent discretion [in who providers accept as customers]," she said, "but if we did just take down their site, they would have every right to sue us...The whole issue is censorship; where does it begin and where do you stop?"

Boro, a lawyer, thinks service providers could be charged with being an accessory if a client engages in criminal activity on the Internet, although the law is hazy.

He made an analogy with telephone companies which routinely cooperate with police when the service they provide is used to make threats or to stalk, for example.

York U business student awarded Rhodes Scholarship

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Irvin Studin was a little boy, he was tested for giftedness twice. Ironically, he failed to meet the criteria both times (possibly because English was not his first language).

These days, there is no question about his exceptional abilities. The 22-year-old York University business student was recently awarded a prestigious Rhodes Scholarship, one of only 11 given annually in Canada.

The scholarship will cover his tuition and living expenses for the next two years at Oxford University in England.

Studin's talents are not restricted to the academic arena. The captain of York's Men's Varsity soccer team, he also represented Canada at the 1997 World Maccabiah Games in Israel, has coached young soccer players and played soccer professionally with the Toronto Lynx.

Both his parents are directors of sports schools – his father of a soccer school, his mother of a gymnastics school – although there has been a series of economics scholars in his mother's family, Studin said.

Irvin Studin

"I became interested in a broad range of things," he added. "I don't believe in limiting yourself."

His parents, Yuri and Sima – Odessa natives who immigrated to Toronto when Studin was two months old (he was born in Rome) – ensured that his childhood was filled with diverse activities, he said in an interview at their home in Thornhill.

Aside from school, where he attended French immersion classes at Aurora High School, Studin grew up playing hockey and soccer, studying music and going to Hebrew school.

Studin sees "huge parallels" between excelling at soccer and at academics. "Soccer is a physical and a mental challenge," he said. "It's very much a strategic game."

His approach to course work has become "quite efficient" in order to make the most of time not devoted to soccer and other extracurricular activities (he has also been a mentor for incoming business students, and served as assistant managing editor of the student newspaper of York's Schulich School of Business).

"In high school," he said, "I used to be a perfectionist to the point of inefficiency."

Although he probably spends less time per course now than in high school, he still pulls all-nighters "quite often."

Studin believes, in academics as in soccer, that it's possible to compensate for weaknesses by working harder.

In the fall, he will begin his master of philosophy degree in economics at Oxford. He hopes to have the scholarship extended so he can pursue doctoral studies.

"This is the opportunity of a lifetime," he enthused.

Eventually, he would like to work in international regulation of corporate competition.

Studin is Schulich's top-ranked bachelor of business administration student. He entered the program on the President's Scholarship, one of the university's top entrance awards, and has won numerous other scholarships.

York economics professor Fred Lazar said he would rank Studin "among the best students I have ever known."

Proposed immigration changes draw praise

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A government white paper that proposes substantial changes to Canada's immigration and refugee-determination legislation, has drawn mostly positive reviews from observers in the Jewish community.

Though they tinged their observations with some concerns and a wait-and-see attitude, the observers applauded the white paper as a vast improvement over a year-old working paper that would have eliminated the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), and would have required immigrants to be proficient in either French or English.

"It's not as irrationally off-kilter as the Not Just Numbers report, which had a whole sequence of loopy recommendations," said immigration lawyer David Matas. "There are some good things here."

The 60-page white paper, released last week, is aimed at making Canada's immigration legislation relevant for the 21st century, said citizenship and immigration minister Lucienne Robillard.

"I want to strengthen and support family reunification; new legislation must modernize our selection system for skilled workers and business immigrants, and ease the entry of highly skilled temporary workers," Robillard said.

"We reiterate our commitment to upholding Canada's humanitarian tradition by strengthening the protection of genuine refugees. We must also continue to maintain the safety of Canadian society. I want to see this process result in a clearer, simpler and more coherent act," she added.

Michael Briks, executive vice-president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) said the agency backs the minister's emphasis on family reunification and maintaining Canada's humanitarian tradition of protecting refugees.

A proposal that permits, when possible, the processing of refugee families overseas and rapid reunification "is a very positive step," he said.

Eric Vernon, director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ottawa advocacy centre, said Congress supports, in principle, the minister's proposal to strengthen family reunification. "We see that as a cornerstone of Canadian immigration policy."

There appears to be a widening of the definition of the family members to include relatives like aunts and uncles who are not immediate family members, Vernon said. The move to boost the age of dependency from 19 to 22 is "reasonable at first blush," he added.

Immigration lawyer Mendel Green, said some of his Israeli clients should benefit from that provision. Under current practice, immigrants' children over 19 must make their own application to move to Canada, unless they were enrolled in school full time. By raising the bar to 22, families immigrating from countries with military conscription – like Israel or Taiwan – will be able to bring their son or daughter as part of the same family unit, said Green, founding chair of the Canadian Bar Association's immigration section.

"In my office, we have 20 cases where parents decided not to leave Israel, and stay with their children," he noted.

A second proposal should cut down on "a tremendous abuse of the refugee-determination system" that involves Russian-Israelis moving to Canada and claiming refugee status. Currently, some claim they faced discrimination because their children were not circumcised or because they are living in mixed marriages, he said.

Refugee applicants can wait two to three years while living on social assistance in Canada. The white paper suggests speeding up the refugee-determination system which should reduce "spurious claims" and "send them packing," he contended.

Green, Matas and Vernon all backed a proposal that would remove from war criminals the right to appeal against deportation on humanitarian or compassionate grounds.

Vernon said Congress was disappointed the white paper did not accept its recommendations to include "extremist hatemongers" among the classes ineligible to remain in Canada on humanitarian or compassionate grounds.

Green and Matas backed the proposal to increase the IRB's role by consolidating decision making on refugee claims and risk review. But Vernon said Congress questioned expanding the IRB's jurisdiction in light of what it considers unanswered questions about alleged systemic discrimination in the IRB.

"We believe the IRB must be examined thoroughly by an independent examiner," he said.

In light of allegations of anti-semitism in the IRB, "we have concerns about expanding its mandate."

JNF Negev Dinner returns to Saint John, New Brunswick

SAINT JOHN, N.B. — The first Negev Dinner held here in 10 years honored Senator Erminie Joy Cohen.

Cohen's father, Mitchell Bernstein, was New Brunswick's first Negev honoree.

Some 500 people from every community across the province attended the dinner, which raised more than $300,000, surpassing the goal for the evening.

Funds raised were to be used to plant 25,000 trees in Israel, and Cohen chose as her project a New Brunswick forest at Yatir.

The dinner should raise awareness about Israel with her "fellow New Brunswickers," she says. "I hope they embrace the project with enthusiasm."

Dinner organizers say that Cohen is "a person who has transcended the boundaries of community affairs, politics, social justice and religion."

Campaign co-chairs were Senator Noel Kinsella and Teri Levine.

Naomi Frankenburg, national president of JNF, presented Cohen with a Negev Dinner citation.

Maccabi Bridge Disaster

Four athletes demand MWU resignations

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A victim of the bridge collapse being rushed to the hospital [RNS/Reuters]

TORONTO —The protest against the leadership of the Maccabi World Union (MWU) is widening.

Last week, four medal-winning Maccabiah Games athletes joined the chorus of voices calling on two senior MWU officials to resign because of a bridge collapse that killed four Australian athletes and injured dozens more during the opening ceremonies of the 1997 Maccabiah Games.

To underscore their demand, the Israeli athletes turned in their Maccabiah Games medals during a special Knesset committee hearing into the tragedy.

Committee chair Micha Goldman announced he will propose that the two executives, MWU president Ronald Bakalarz and MWU chair Uzi Netanel, step down immediately. "Those who are morally responsible for the tragedy cannot run away from their responsibilities," a news release quotes him as saying.

The Knesset committee's hearings, which were launched at the urgent behest of the Australian Jewish community, coincide with civil and criminal cases resulting from the bridge collapse. Yoram Eyal, the former chair of the Maccabiah organizing committee, as well as the bridge engineer and three contractors, are facing criminal charges while civil claims have also been filed by families of the victims.

In addition to the human toll, the tragedy has created a rift between the Australian Jewish community and the MWU, which has been accused of shirking its responsibility for the mishap.

Two senior Australian Jewish organizations, the Zionist Federation of Australia and the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, have called for the resignations of Bakalarz and Netanel, pending the Knesset investigation into the tragedy. The Maccabi officials have declined to relinquish their posts.

Addressing the Knesset committee, attorney Robert Kaye, representing the victims and the families of those killed, also urged Bakalarz and Netanel to step down.

The officials' resignations would "recognize the principles of accountability and governance," Kaye told the Knesset hearing. "The president and chair need not have personally built that matchstick-like structure to subject themselves to such a duty...They assumed responsibility with all the perks, advantages and disadvantages of their office. They must now act in accordance with accepted principles of accountability and step aside."

In a news release, Kaye said such a resignation "would ease the burden of the victims and their families and demonstrate sensitivity. These are people who feel they have been abandoned by the MWU, and what is worse, have been cast as villains for daring to voice criticism."

The resignations would also "send a strong message to Maccabi athletes worldwide that this is an organization prepared to change direction and address its shortcomings," Kaye stated. "In so doing, the organization will be in a position to rebuild its credibility and restore its integrity. It is ultimately a question of trust...If those bearing the ultimate responsibility remain in their positions, this will be interpreted in Australia as a lack of compassion, and a statement that the Maccabi movement is indifferent to the well-being of our children."

MWU officials have steadfastly denied suggestions they were indifferent to the victims. Roy Salomon, president of Maccabi Canada and a member of the MWU executive, said members of the Maccabi organization visited the victims in the hospital and arranged for financial compensation.

Last February, Salomon joined a high level MWU delegation that travelled to Australia to explain the organization's point of view at public meetings of the country's Jewish community.

The mission expressed MWU's sympathies and tried to explain the MWU's role in the wake of the tragedy.

The Australian Jewish community has many misconceptions about the MWU, thinking it played down the tragedy and did little to help them in their hour of need, Salomon said.

"We feel really terrible about what happened," he said at the time. "From day one, we reacted in a very compassionate way."

Montreal law professor and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler has also waded into the issue. Following a trip to Australia last fall, he said he found "the close-knit Australian community, with its almost mythic view of Israel, has been disappointed. Their pain is due to a tragedy that was caused by criminal negligence and they feel that since then, Israel has been dragging its feet" in getting to the bottom of it.

The question of responsibility for the collapse is "not a matter limited to the families of the victims. I saw it as pervasive. It's an important issue in Australia-Israel relations," Cotler said.

For Australian Jews, the bridge collapse is especially painful because it was preventable, Cotler said. Australians he met asked "how could this negligence have been allowed to occur?" They also ask, "why is it taking so long for justice to be done and why are there no MWU resignations?" he added.

Victoria shul gets new rabbi

By KITTY HOFFMAN
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — Rabbi David Seidenberg is the new spiritual leader and teacher at Congregation Emanuel, the oldest continuing synagogue in Canada.

Rabbi Seidenberg, who has rabbinic ordination from the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, is a PhD candidate at the seminary, where he is focusing his research on eco-theology, the relationship of theology and the natural world.

His interest in the links between spirituality and the environment, he said, was a factor in his decision to choose Victoria as his home. He was impressed by the fact that Victoria's "larger community has a spiritual dimension that includes activity around alternative spirituality linked to ecology and the environment.

"There is already a well-developed spiritual community in the synagogue, and a high sense of responsibility among the lay leaders."

Rabbi Seidenberg said he is delighted to "help bring the group to a higher level of learning and engagement with the spiritual sources and tradition."

As the rabbi of the only synagogue on Vancouver Island and the Gulf Islands, Rabbi Seidenberg wants to remain open to a diversity of Jewish approaches and orientations.

His first role as rabbi was to lead the High Holy Day services, where he interspersed Sephardi tunes and chassidic niggunim into the traditional Conservative liturgy. He has already invited other Jewish groups – Reform, Orthodox and Secular Jewish Humanists – to participate in rituals such as the public Chanukah candlelighting at the shul.

He is scheduled to begin teaching a course in Maimonides at the Jewish Community Centre.

The rabbi said his objective is to help people take "personal responsibility for their spiritual lives, [for example, by] learning enough Hebrew to know when they're encountering a poor translation."

The goal, he said, is "to know enough of the tradition to have an adult relationship with Judaism, so that we can become creators, and not merely consumers of Jewish life."

Rabbi Seidenberg said that outreach is "not just about more people in shul, but more people davening with kavanah, with real intention, and to have the tools to use davening and meditation in a serious way."

Similarly, he said, Shabbat is "not just about not working or turning on lights, but rather, about creating a unique and holy relationship with the world around us.

"This is linked with more involvement in social justice and environmental issues."

He is stressed that his approach is one among many possible paths. He is dedicated, he said, to establishing "creative opportunities for people to find their own path, [to take part], for example, in classes where they are not embarrassed by their lack of experience, or services where [they] can learn to daven."

Rabbi Seidenberg said he wants to "integrate chassidic spirituality, the joy of getting closer to God, with contemporary egalitarianism."

U.S. firm buys Winnipeg teenager's Web site

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Fifteen-year-old Jay Strauss is like most kids his age.

He attended Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education schools until this year and is involved in BBYO, serving as co-president of his chapter.

Like many other teens, he also enjoys fooling around with computers. But Strauss doesn't just surf the Web or visit chat sites.

Three years ago, he established Teens Online [www.teensonline.com], a site with chat rooms, e-mail services and sports and entertainment news that has become very popular with Winnipeg teens.

Now, Strauss and Teens Online have hit the big time.

Last summer, Teens Online caught the attention of Jeff Edelman, president of The Student Centre, a popular New York-based group of Web sites for college and high school students.

Edelman was so impressed by Teens Online that he drew up a proposal to buy the Winnipeg Web site. After some electronic negotiation, Strauss accepted Edelman's offer and the deal went through at the beginning of December.

Under the terms of the agreement, Strauss will continue to operate Teens Online as a salaried senior vice-president, and several of his friends who worked with him will also have executive positions.

As a result of the merger, Strauss has been receiving reams of publicity, including radio interviews and a profile in a local newspaper. He is also be the subject of a profile in an upcoming issue of Family PC, which has a circulation of 500,000.

Strauss remains modest about his business success and newfound fame. His top priority, he says, is to do well in his exams and get through Grade 10.

Arnold Fradkin remembered for prosecuting Nazi war criminals

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Arnold Fradkin, the Department of Justice lawyer best known for his work in the War Crimes Unit, died suddenly. He was 56.

Fradkin, born in Winnipeg, was the son of the late Harry and Gerry Fradkin. The family moved to Montreal, where Fradkin graduated from Sir George Williams University and received his law degree from McGill University.

In 1969, he moved to Ottawa to work for the Department of Justice. Throughout his nearly 30-year career, he worked in various areas of the department, including combines and anti-trusts, criminal litigation and civil litigation.

In 1987, Fradkin was one of the founding members of the War Crimes Unit, and eventually became deputy director. In 1991 he returned to the civil litigation area.

Fradkin gained recognition when he and William Hobson, War Crimes Unit director, successfully prosecuted the precedent-setting case against Dutch immigrant Jacob Luitjens.

Luitjens, a retired University of British Columbia botany professor, lost his Canadian citizenship, and was deported to Holland, where he had been convicted in absentia of collaborating with the Nazis.

Hobson spoke of his relationship with Fradkin as a "once in a lifetime opportunity to work with a person with a great sense of humor, a great legal mind and a great ability to challenge everything, so that nobody is hurt by injustice." He talked about Fradkin's deep compassion, even while acting as a prosecutor.

Driven by a quest for justice

Fradkin was recognized by colleagues, as well as representatives of such Jewish organizations as B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, as a dedicated and committed professional, driven by a quest for justice.

He considered his work on the War Crimes Unit "a truly righteous fight," said his wife Barbara. "He had a real passion for justice, which protected the powerless, the person without connections. He went into law because he believed that justice worked."

Prof. Irving Abella, chair of the CJC war crimes committee, described Fradkin as "the fibre and backbone of the War Crimes Unit, a consummate public servant committed to justice and...determined to make sure that no mass murderers are living in Canada."

An inquiry in response to recent allegations by Hobson that Fradkin had been subjected to anti-Semitic attitudes, resulted in a report by Osgoode Hall law Prof. John McCamus, which cleared the Department of Justice of any wrongdoing.

Fradkin had planned on retiring in the spring. "He was a good [landscape] painter, and that was his way of finding calm and peace after a day of fighting in the courts. It was his way of re-connecting to tranquillity," said his wife.

Fradkin is also survived by three children, Leslie, Dana and Jeremy.

Miller served as managing director of CJN in Montreal

MONTREAL — Lou Miller, who ended a 45-year career in newspapers as managing director of The Canadian Jewish News' Montreal office, died recently after a lengthy illness at age 70.

He had suffered from the complication of diabetes for some years.

Miller, who was with The CJN from 1984-91, was best known as publisher of the Notre-Dame-de-Grace-based The Monitor and other West End weekly newspapers.

Miller, whose actual first name was Irvin, began newspaper reporting at 17 on local sports in his native Lachine. The Miller family had a general store in that suburb, which was home to a sizable Jewish community in the 1930s.

In an interview, Miller recalled how a great uncle who had one of the contracts to dig the Lachine Canal persuaded Miller's grandfather to leave Europe and open a store for the workmen from Montreal and the Indian reservation across the river.

Soon after World War II, Miller landed a job at the Gazette covering amateur sports, which he did for 11 years.

He was then hired as editor of the new Montreal Sun, which was founded after the Herald folded. The Sun closed after 28 issues, but Miller was shortly employed again as managing editor of The Monitor. Later, he was also advertising director of other weeklies in Verdun and Westmount.

Longtime colleague Joe King described Miller as "a colorful newspaperman of the old persuasion.

"He did his reporting in a methodical way, yet he could add the kind of wording that made a story come alive."

Miller would eventually take over the operation of The Monitor, and then the St. Laurent News, for a nominal $1 a year, with the proviso that he would continue to do all his printing with The Monitor company.

The Monitor became a popular and profitable publication, and by 1970, Miller opened his own typesetting company.

He was president of the Quebec Weekly Newspaper Association in 1965 and headed the Canadian Community Newspaper Association in 1972, and a year later became chair of its board.

Miller spent the year travelling across the country meeting with small-town publishers, and what he learned strengthened his conviction that weeklies were the future of the newspaper business, rather than the big-city dailies.

Over the years, Miller had an avid interest in sports, refereeing amateur football and hockey, and for 11 years calling Alouette football games at Molson Stadium.

He was also associated with the Progressive Conservatives, and ran unsuccessfully as their candidate in 1977 in NDG.

Twenty years ago, he sold his papers and company to a large community newspaper chain, but stayed on for five years to run The Monitor.

Miller's challenge when he was hired by The CJN was to turn its Montreal edition around financially and put it on a more equal footing with the stronger Toronto edition.

Miller was awarded the Canada Medal for Service to the Community and the Queen's Silver Jubilee Medal for his work with the Montreal Westward Rotary Club and the community newspaper associations.

He is survived by Celia, his wife of 46 years, and daughters and sons-in-law Laurie and Bruno, and Audrey and Ronald, and five grandsons.

Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario in action

By RABBI AMRAM ASSAYAG

Forty years ago, the first wave of Sephardi Jews arrived in Ontario, with the majority settling in Toronto. Over the years,

Backgrounder

Sephardim have distinguished themselves in business, the arts and the professions.

Today, as we continue to grow, many Sephardim yearn to reconnect to the glorious heritage of their forefathers, while many others are only remotely aware that it ever existed.

The Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario, established three years ago as an umbrella organization, provides religious services for the Sephardi synagogues, institutions and organizations throughout the province, and is responsible for preserving and perpetuating Sephardi heritage and Halachah (Jewish law).

Rabbi Amram Assayag

Today more than ever, as we confront the dangers of secular values and contemporary culture, assimilation and intermarriage, we have a moral duty to rekindle the brilliance of Sephardi Torah observance. But first, we must give everyone in our community, young and old, the knowledge and the tools to start the journey.

To begin, it is important to note that Sephardim follow the Halachah as established by Rabbi Joseph Caro (1488-1575). Born in Toledo, Spain, Rabbi Caro left for Portugal as a result of the Expulsion in 1492, moved to Turkey, and in 1537, settled in the city of Safed in northern Israel, where he was soon revered as the leading Torah and halachic authority.

His monumental work, the Bet Yosef, written in response to the tremendous upheavals of his generation, is a massive compilation of Jewish law. It codifies the decisions of earlier authorities on every issue of practical, day-to-day living, and includes the spiritual significance of these rabbinic rulings.

In 1564, Rabbi Caro wrote the Shulchan Aruch, a simplified, shortened digest of the Bet Yosef. The Shulchan Aruch spread rapidly throughout the Sephardi world and still remains the authoritative Halachah.

Today, Sephardi Halachah also contains the Takanot, rulings made by the rabbis throughout the generations dealing with certain issues pertaining to specific communities or countries.

Ashkenazim follow the Halachah of Rabbi Moishe Isserles (1530 to 1572), a renowned Polish rabbi who founded an outstanding rabbinical academy in his native Krakow. His notes, which covered Rabbi Caro's Shulchan Aruch with an Ashkenazi mapah (tablecloth), soon became the Halachah of all the European Jewish communities.

Today, Ashkenazim around the world use Rabbi Caro's Shulchan Aruch together with Rabbi Isserles' notes as their Code of Law.

For further insight into the Sephardi world, it is important to know that every city, no matter how large or small, in every country, from North Africa to the Middle East, had its own beit din (rabbinical court); each was comprised of three rabbis appointed by the community's officials, with the approval of the government. The secular authorities always had great respect for the activities and rulings of these rabbis. In fact, the beit din administered all religious, social and civil affairs, and therefore, Jews never went to the local or national government for any official documents.

Because the beit din's system of record keeping was so meticulously maintained, there was a uniformity and common structure in all the Sephardi communities. Even today, one phone call to a rabbi in any Sephardi country can quickly reveal a 200-year family history of marriages, divorces, births, conversions, adoptions and everything required to establish a person's genealogy.

To revive these traditions and unite our diverse communities, the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario provides a full range of services in accordance with Sephardi Halachah. All are available in French, Spanish and Hebrew, the languages familiar to many people in our community, as well as in English.

The rabbinate also has its own beit din, which provides rabbinical arbitration in business and financial conflicts, and, working in conjunction with the Toronto beit din, grants gittin (divorces). The beit din of the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario, is fully endorsed by the Rabbanut Harashit, the Chief Rabbinate of Israel.

The Sephardi beit din eliminates the problems created by the differences between Ashkenazi and Sephardi gittin, such as variations in the actual text of the divorce document. As well, because the two traditions pronounce some Hebrew letters and vowels differently, there are differences in the spellings of the couple's Jewish and secular names.

In cases requiring rabbinical arbitration, the beit din rules according to the Halachah of the Bet Yoseph, and if any of the issues involve business, finances or inheritance, the rulings of the Takanot are included.

In the area of kashrut, Sephardi and Ashkenazi halachot also are dissimilar in significant ways. Because of the particulars regarding a cow's lungs and tissues, there are notable differences between Sephardi and Ashkenazi Halachah in defining what constitutes kosher meat.

The Sephardi Halachah for Passover also presents considerable variation and difficulties. Even though Sephardim can eat legumes, such as corn, peas, chick peas, beans and peanuts, there is no kosher for Passover hashgachah for these products and their derivatives.

To alleviate these and other kashrut problems, the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario and the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR) have agreed to fully cooperate with each other in a joint effort to accommodate these unique communal needs. Foods that meet the specific requirements of Sephardi Halachah will carry the Sephardic hashgachah in addition to COR certification. This hashgachah will only appear on foods that are first certified by COR.

For Passover, however, foods permitted to Sephardim but forbidden to Ashkenazim, will carry only the Sephardic symbol of hashgachah.

To stimulate the learning of Sephardi Halachah, the rabbinate publishes materials describing the laws and the spiritual significance of the chagim, Shabbat, the roles of men and women, divorce, mikvah; and life cycle events, such as brit, bar mitzvah, engagement, wedding, death, mourning and more. This vital information is available at the rabbinate, as well as distributed in synagogues and schools and through lectures.

Other services provided by the rabbinate include officiating at religious ceremonies, counselling families in crisis, enhancing an existing system of bikkur cholim (visiting the sick), and providing chaplaincy services for hospitals and correctional institutions.

The rabbinate continues to provide the services of a Sephardi Hebra Kadisha and officiate at funerals.

The Sephardic Rabbinate has staff that deals with special issues of concern to constituents who are immigrants or seniors. These include signing passport applications, senior citizen certification, translation into English of civil marriage and divorce certificates, ketubot and birth certificates, and writing recommendation letters for immigration purposes, Jewish agencies, schools, social assistance, employment and other needs.

Today when we take a close look at our people, we see that far too many Sephardim are totally uninvolved in the Jewish community, with no access to a rabbi or a synagogue. When faced with a life crisis, they become lost with nowhere to turn for practical and spiritual support.

We want to bring them back to their roots. We want them to know that the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario is here for them, as well as for those who are communally active and affiliated. At the community level, the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario supplements the services that Sephardi synagogues as individual institutions are not in a position to offer to their members.

We want Sephardim to take pride in their illustrious ancestry, to realize the importance of a unified community structure and to understand the power of Jewish continuity. For some, the memories of the past are still vivid; for others, the memories are quickly fading. And then there is the new generation, weaned on an open and pluralistic society, for whom Sephardi ancestry and Torah observance are somewhat foreign.

We want the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario to be the one-stop-shopping spot for Sephardim of all ages and backgrounds. With the help of HaKadosh Baruch Hu, it will happen.

The Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario is located at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, 7026 Bathurst St., Thornhill; phone 905 669 7600, fax 905 669 6243 and e-mail [sephardic rabbinate@shaw.wave.ca].

Rabbi Assayag is the chief rabbi of the Abir Yaakob Congregation.

U.S. fears Israel planning Lebanon escalation

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States is worried that Israel is preparing an escalation in Lebanon, including the possibility of launching attacks against Syrian targets in Lebanon, should Hezbollah fire any Katyushas at northern towns, U.S. officials say.

Defence Ministry officials refuse to confirm the possibility of strikes at Syrian targets in Lebanon, but admit that the United States had discussed a possible deterioration due to developments with Hezbollah.

The source of American concern is the upcoming elections in May, and the needs of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government to regain political momentum after it has fallen behind in the polls. Washington also remembers that an Israeli government launched operation Grapes of Wrath on the eve of the 1996 elections.

After a spate of inner cabinet meetings in recent weeks, the cabinet issued a statement, two weeks ago, that it would hit any target in Lebanon if Israel is attacked.

In seeking to persuade Israel to avoid escalation in Lebanon, the United States has made its concerns known to Jerusalem in the last couple of weeks on at least four different occasions.

On Friday, U.S. special Middle East peace envoy Dennis Ross raised the issue with foreign minister Ariel Sharon during their meeting in New York, and there were at least three communications with Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, who [illegible] ambassador to Israel Edward Walker, Ross and State Department Assistant Secretary for Near East Affairs, Martin Indyk.

Avi Benayahu, Mordechai's spokesperson, said, "Defence minister Mordechai does not want escalation in Lebanon. But Israel has told the United States and others that Lebanon holds the potential for deterioration which could impact on the entire region. Therefore, all sides must act with caution. Israel cannot tolerate the recent conduct of Hezbollah."

U.S. officials are concerned that Mordechai could come under mounting pressure inside the Likud, before a party list is compiled next month, to act with haste in Lebanon as a way of garnering support inside the hawkish party.

Mordechai, meanwhile, continues to deny reports that he is holding onto the Defence Ministry portfolio out of fear that if he resigns, Netanyahu would launch an adventurous course in Lebanon.

MK Azmi Bashara of Hadash-Bilad said Syrian President Hafez Assad told him last month in Damascus that Israel may seek to hit Syrian targets in Lebanon, but believed this would not change the underlying political situation in Lebanon. It remained unclear how Syria would retaliate in the event of an Israeli air strike.

Terrorist Abu Nidal reported in Iraq

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Fearful that he may be handed over to a Western government, a Palestinian terrorist said to be responsible for killing or wounding 900 people in 20 countries has moved from Egypt to Iraq, according to news reports here.

Quoting diplomatic sources, the Guardian newspaper said Abu Nidal fled to Baghdad from a Palestinian hospital in a Cairo suburb, where he had been receiving treatment for leukemia.

Now 61 and reportedly dying, Jaffa-born Sabri al-Banna adopted the nom de guerre Abu Nidal when he joined the Palestine Liberation Organization. After a meteoric rise through the group's hierarchy, he broke with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat in the early 1970s to oppose the possibility of a negotiated settlement with Israel.

Later, as head of his own Fatah Revolutionary Council – once described by the U.S. State Department as "the most dangerous terrorist organization in existence" – he was, at times, backed by Iraq, Syria, and most recently, Libya, where he had lived until arriving in Cairo last July under a false name and carrying a Tunisian passport.

Since 1974, Abu Nidal's death squads have struck at Israeli, Jewish and western targets, as well as at PLO officials who were regarded as moderate.

Among Abu Nidal's most recent high-profile attacks were the simultaneous gun-and-grenade attacks on the El Al passenger counters at Rome and Vienna airports in 1985, and the assassination of the PLO intelligence chief in1991.

Abu Nidal is believed to have moved to Iraq in mid-December and is reportedly being treated in one of the lavishly equipped clinics reserved for Saddam Hussein and his inner circle.

Arab sources were quoted as saying the Libyans, already facing western pressure over Libya's refusal to extradite two bombing suspects from the 1988 Pan Am 103 crash in Lockerbie, Scotland, wanted to find another country where Abu Nidal could spend his final days. And the Egyptians sought to end an embarrassment for President Hosni Mubarak.

"It is entirely credible that he is in Iraq," said a veteran Middle East analyst. "Saddam doesn't forget a friend, just the same way as he doesn't forget an enemy."

Abu Nidal served as PLO representative to Baghdad in the 1970s.

He is thought to have feared that Egypt would succumb to the sort of pressure that led Sudan to hand over the international terrorist known as Carlos the Jackal, who was seized in 1994, taken to France and convicted of murder charges.

Abu Nidal's organization, broken by internal feuds as its leader became increasingly enfeebled, is no longer considered an active terrorist threat.

Some of the cult members maintain contact with their families, but mask their whereabouts by communicating only via e-mail.

Miller is said to have extracted substantial sums of money from his followers. Two reportedly handed over a business to him, and he also acquired a major share in a construction company, which he ran with two other followers.

Miller and his wife Marcia were the subject of bankruptcy proceedings in October 1997. He is said to owe tens of thousands of dollars in taxes, as well as debts to a string of Denver radio stations that ran his advertisements.

He is reported to have informed his creditors that they should be happy to serve God.

May 17

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's former right-hand man, Avigdor Lieberman, launched an immigrant-rights political party, called Israel, Our Home, which pledges to limit the power of the Supreme Court and to cut back the police force. Political observers described Lieberman's populist rhetoric as dangerous. Netanyahu distanced himself from the the attack on the Supreme Court.

• Dan Meridor, who left the Likud party to challenge Netanyahu and former army chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, acknowledged that they had not yet decided who would lead their new centrist party, but agreed to work together regardless of the decision.

• The man known as the prime minister's mentor, Moshe Arens, said he would run for head of the Likud party if there was enough grassroots support for his candidacy.

• Netanyahu is bringing Israel to the brink of disaster, Lipkin-Shahak charged in announcing his own candidacy for prime minister.

• Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon downplayed expectations that he may challenge Netanyahu for the leadership of the Likud party. He said he is working "to get more unity in the Likud party and the national camp."

• The Likud party launched its election campaign with a scathing attack upon Ehud Barak. Party officials taunted Barak to reveal his true agenda, which they described as total capitulation to the Palestinians. Officials made no reference to the prime minister himself nor to any candidates other than Barak.

ROUGH RIDE

Former IDF chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak received a rough reception while campaigning for Prime Minister in the outdoor Hatikvah Market in south Tel Aviv. The market is traditionally a bastion of Likud support. Lipkin-Shahak was threatened and was on the receiving end of bits of tomato, chicken and fruit thrown at him by irate shoppers. One man was arrested and charged with incitement following Lipkin-Shahak's foray into "enemy" territory. [Isranet photo]

Jan. 4

• Two Jewish women were wounded when gunmen opened fire on a van travelling between Kiryat Arba and Hebron.

• The U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv reopened after being evacuated amid warnings of a possible terrorist attack.

Jan. 5

• Seven Israeli contractors submitted bids for construction of housing on Har Choma. The government plans to award the contract to one contractor within the next two weeks, and hopes construction of the first of the planned 1,025 houses can begin within a matter of months.

Jan. 6

• Faulty intelligence was to blame for a recent air attack in Lebanon that led to the deaths of a Lebanese woman and six of her seven children, according to an Israeli military inquiry. Intelligence photos of the site were outdated.

• Hezbollah gunmen detonated a roadside bomb as an Israeli was en route to an army base in southern Lebanon. One Israeli soldier was seriously wounded.

• Israel wounded several Lebanese civilians in a raid on suspected Hezbollah targets in south Lebanon. Meanwhile, Israel said it had killed a top Hezbollah bomb expert last week.

Jan. 7

• The Supreme Court ordered religious affairs minister Eli Suissa to explain why he was blocking religious councils that include non-Orthodox members from meeting. The court order was issued after Suissa called on the Haifa religious council, which includes a Reform and a Conservative member, not to hold a scheduled meeting this week.

• Israel issued deportation orders against three more members of a Denver-based doomsday cult. It was unclear when they, along with 13 other cult members, would be deported.

Jan. 8

• Prime Minster Benjamin Netanyahu announced that he plans to raise the inflation target prior to the elections from the current target of four percent to between five and seven percent.

• Conversions: Orthodox parties in the Knesset are attempting to revive the conversion bill after the Jerusalem District Court recently ordered the Interior Ministry to recognize as Jewish 23 people who underwent conversions performed by Conservative and Reform rabbis.

The bill has been redrafted to incorporate the Ne'eman committee's proposals. But leaders of the liberal movements say this undermines the spirit of the compromise, which was meant to avoid legislation codifying Orthodox control over conversions.

The ruling is being appealed to Israel's Supreme Court, which is considered likely to uphold it. But recognizing the potential for further discord, Hanan Porat, chair of the Knesset's Law Committee, said he would ask the Supreme Court to postpone hearing the appeal until after Israel's May 17 national elections.

• Religious councils: In another piece of legislation prompted by a court ruling – this time from the Supreme Court – Orthodox legislators, last month, won support in the first of three Knesset votes on a bill designed to bypass the high court's decision requiring the government to appoint Conservative and Reform representatives to municipal religious councils.

The "bypass bill" requires every member of a religious council to abide by rulings of the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate. Reform and Conservative leaders are furious, saying the bill mocks the court's ruling.

The Knesset Law Committee postponed the second and third votes on the bill by the full legislature. But at the same time, the Chief Rabbinate ordered local religious councils not to convene as long as Reform and Conservative members take their seats.

The ongoing pluralism battle dates back to Israel's founding.

The 1948 Declaration of Independence defined Israel as a Jewish and democratic state. But the failure to agree on a constitution has left ambiguities that persist until today.

Israel's Law of Return, has historically been the source of the problem. The law was amended in 1970 to define a Jew, for the purpose of receiving citizenship, as "one born of a Jewish mother or who has converted."

The "Who is a Jew" issue took on greater urgency in the mid-1980s, when Shas, a haredi party, secured control of the Interior Ministry and tried to prevent those converted by the Reform and Conservative movements abroad from being registered in Israel as Jewish.

A landmark ruling in 1989 required the government to register anyone converted abroad as Jews, including those converted by Reform and Conservative rabbis.

For the liberal Jewish movements, the struggle has always been a matter of principle. They want to know that the Jewish state fully recognizes Diaspora Jews, the bulk of whom are Conservative or Reform.

Since the 1989 ruling, the Reform and Conservative movements have repeatedly turned to the courts.

But these court decisions infuriated the Orthodox, who accused the movements of trying to breach the "status quo," a set of principles on religion and state that were agreed to by the Orthodox and David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister.

[illegible] agreements he forged before taking office in 1996, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu promised his powerful Orthodox allies he would push through the conversion bill.

April 1997 marked a turning point. Going to the Supreme Court to obtain recognition of conversions performed in Israel, the Orthodox parties pushed through the first of three votes on the conversion bill, sparking a severe crisis of confidence between Diaspora Jewry and Israel.

In June 1997, both sides agreed to freeze all court petitions and legislative moves while the Ne'eman committee explored possible solutions to the crisis.

Israeli Newspapers frequently reported the intricacies of the debate. Moderate Orthodox groups backing the Ne'eman Commission sprouted. More and more Knesset members began to support the campaign for religious equality.

But the liberal movements say the Orthodox leadership never really embraced the compromise, and has even stepped up anti-Reform and anti-Conservative rhetoric.

The cautious optimism of last year, when the committee issued its compromise, is now a distant memory.

In New York last week, leaders of the Reform and Conservative movements warned that legislative efforts to circumvent the recent Israeli court decisions threaten to damage the emotional and philanthropic ties between North American and Israeli Jewry.

They called on Diaspora Jews not to support candidates in the upcoming Israeli elections who back the Orthodox legislative efforts.

Here in Israel, the rhetoric has also been sharp.

"There is always room to go back on the path of compromise," said Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Religious Action Centre in Israel.

But, Shlomo Benizri, an influential Shas Knesset member said, "There can be no compromise."

Regev and Benizri agree, however, that the Ne'eman committee's goals were overambitious.

This being the case, both Regev and Benizri think the only way to avert disaster may be to try to forge a technical solution, such as abolishing the line listing nationality on Israeli identity cards.

This would render the need to register converts as Jews a non-issue. But for a new solution to be found, the various streams must be willing to talk – a daunting task, given all the overheated rhetoric.

Honor urged for envoy who saved thousands

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A British diplomat, who saved as many as 10,000 Jews from the Holocaust, deserves official recognition from Israel, according to a senior British Jewish leader.

Lord Janner, head of the London-based Holocaust Educational Trust, said Frank Foley should be designated one of the Righteous Among Nations by Jerusalem's Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial, to recognize Foley's efforts to rescue Jews from Nazi Germany.

And based on evidence that is only now emerging, Foley could enter the history books as one of the great equal to Oskar Schindler, Raoul Wallenberg and the Japanese diplomat Chiune Sugihara.

As director of the British passport office in Berlin during the 1930s, Foley freely handed out visas to Jews in Germany and sheltered several in his home, Janner said in an open letter to Yad Vashem officials.

Middle-aged, with round, owlish glasses framing a face topped by a balding head, Foley did not cut a particularly heroic figure in 1930s Berlin.

But he was more than he appeared to be: Far from his public role as a gray paper-pusher, Foley fulfilled his true mission as the Berlin station chief for British intelligence until the outbreak of World War II.

Foley used his power and influence as British passport control officer in Berlin [illegible] work – to help German Jews immigrate to Britain and its colonies, including Palestine.

Unlike Schindler, whose industrial enterprises benefited from the Jews he saved, or Wallenberg, who operated under diplomatic protection, Foley received no financial reward nor did he enjoy diplomatic immunity.

Born in 1884, Foley was a veteran of World War I. Fluent in German and French, he was recruited to Britain's MI-6 intelligence agency, where he rose to the rank of captain.

By the end of World War II, Foley had compiled a prodigious record of achievement. He had convinced scores of German spies to become double agents, organized the operation that saved Norway's gold reserves from being looted by the Nazis, and persuaded leading German scientists not to pass on essential data about atomic and rocket advances to their Nazi superiors.

Foley was also a principal interrogator of Rudolf Hess, Hitler's deputy, who flew to Britain in a bizarre attempt to strike a peace deal when the war was already lost. Foley also recruited a high-level Soviet spy who, for years after the war, continued to feed Britain information on Soviet espionage.

But it was the rescue – at great personal risk – of German Jews that will be Foley's legacy.

The remarkable story is told in Foley: The Spy Who Saved 10,000 Jews, by British journalist Michael Smith, which will soon be published in Britain.

According to Smith, Foley "ignored all the rules to help Jews to leave the country, sometimes demanding to be let into concentration camps to get them out, occasionally hiding them in his own home, and using his Secret Service skills to provide them with false papers and passports."

Among those who sought shelter in Foley's apartment was Rabbi Leo Baeck, the charismatic head of the Association of German Rabbis, who used the venue to brief foreign journalists on the increasing persecution of the Jews in the Third Reich.

The question that baffled Benno Cohn, then chair of the German Zionist Organization, and his colleagues in the Zionist movement, was why Foley should demonstrate such commitment at such high personal risk to save Jews.

Personal risk

"He told us he was acting as a Christian and that he wanted to show us how little the 'Christians' who were then in power in Germany had to do with Christianity. He detested the Nazis and looked on their political system – as he once told me – as the rule of Satan on earth," Cohn said in the book.

Foley's work in Berlin, said Smith, was "a stupendous act of humanity, borne not out of political necessity but out of a moral imperative: Thousands of Jews came to the little office on Tiergartenstrasse, frightened, panicky and desperate for help.

"In the tiny office, they found a tiny staff grappling with a blizzard of paper, and at its centre, a small, round man in spectacles. He did not let them down."

Foley's wife Kay, recalled that he worked without a break from 7 a.m. to 10 p.m., personally handling as many applications as he could, assisting his staff, and giving advice and comfort to those who were waiting for their applications to be processed.

Eventually, the line outside the office was a mile long. As Kay Foley observed in the book: "Some were hysterical. Many wept. All were desperate. With them came a flood of cables and letters from other parts of the country, all pleading for visas and begging for help."

As conditions worsened for Jews in Berlin, Foley took greater risks by allowing some Jews, including Baeck, to live in his home at [illegible] ingstrasse 56.

Between 1933 and 1939, tens of thousands more people received visas than should have, given a strict interpretation of the rules according to Hubert Pollack, one of the Jewish workers trying to get Jews into Palestine.

Even after he locked up his office on Tiergartenstrasse for the last time on Aug. 25, 1939, Foley continued to help Jews escape. During the first week of the war, Youth Aliyah certificates that he had signed were used by the U.S. Embassy to send hundreds of Jewish children to safety in Scandinavia and, through the Italian port of Trieste, to Palestine.

"He carried out thousands of rescues when one can be enough to qualify," Janner wrote to Yad Vashem. "He risked his own life and position, and did not seek any remuneration for his actions."

Paula Quirk and her family, who live in London, owe their survival to Foley. She feels "very strongly that the English people who helped never got the credit they deserved. Foley, in his modesty, never told people how much he did."

Frank Foley died in 1958. Was it simple modesty that prevented him from discussing his role in 1930s Berlin? Why has his story remained unknown for so long?

According to Smith, Foley's association with British intelligence inhibited him from discussing the activities he performed while in the service.

"He was not allowed to talk to people when he came back to Britain," said Smith. "His life in Berlin had to remain secret."

Influenza virus returns for the winter season

TORONTO — What is the flu? Influenza, commonly known as the flu, is a virus according to Dr. Allison McGeer, microbiologist and infectious disease consultant for Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto.

Viruses are single-celled forms of life that are smaller than bacteria and can only survive in plant or animal cells. The virus lives by finding new cells to attack, and outlives a person's immune systems by changing its composition into new strains to survive.

"Viruses enter the body either when you breathe in droplets that someone sprays out when they sneeze or cough or when you have contact with an infected person's face or hands," says McGeer.

"You could probably get it from picking up someone's tissue, if you pick up a loaded one and don't wash your hands before you touch your face. You won't, however, get it from touching elevator buttons or telephones.

"The virus affects the cells that line your nose, into your throat and lungs. You develop an immune response and cells move in to kill the virus. You make a bunch of cells that go into the area, and fluid comes with them, making you swell up, giving you a stuffed up nose. When the cells attack the virus, they release chemicals which can cause fever and aches and pains."

For most people the virus is stopped in the head area, but for people with weaker immune systems, the virus can spread to the lungs and to other areas of the body, says McGeer.

The virus itself can cause serious pneumonia and it makes older people and those with weak immune systems much more susceptible to pneumonia caused by bacteria, she adds.

"Each year one in six Canadians – one in three in households with children – get the flu, which generally lasts for about a week. Most people have fever, a cough and a general feeling of being sick and many people also have stuffy, runny noses, headaches, sore throats, muscle aches, and feelings of chilliness, she says, noting that while the fever is usually gone in about three days, the other symptoms last a week on average."

Commenting on the contagiousness of the flu, McGeer says, it is likely transmitted before one gets sick. "Maybe early on when you feel ill but you're not sure what it is. After three or four days you're not shedding much of the virus.

"When the flu is very active you're going to get it from someone (if you're not vaccinated). There's no point in blaming co-workers or family. If you don't get it from one person you'll get it from someone else."

To avoid getting the flu, she recommends that anybody at risk of serious illness, that is, anyone over the age of 65 or who has a chronic illness, get the vaccine.

She also advises anyone who takes care of or lives with a person who is at risk, to get vaccinated as well, to avoid infecting someone else. "In addition, anyone who doesn't want to get influenza or to pass it on should be vaccinated. The vaccine is safe and very effective in healthy adults."

She stresses that people need a new flu shot each year because each vaccination is tailored to battle the known virus strains in circulation.

New viruses may hit hard in their first year because vaccines aren't designed to fight them, McGeer says. "The good news is last year's new virus, Sydney A, is countered by this year's shot."

Because influenza is a virus, antibiotics are not an effective treatment, she says. "There's not much you can do once you've got it. Consumption of a lot of liquid and pain killers are the best treatment. The important thing is to get vaccinated for it."

McGeer warns that children should not be given aspirin to treat the flu. Aspirin can cause the flu to develop into Reyes Syndrome, which attacks the kidney, liver and brain and can be fatal, she explains. Acetaminophen should be used instead, she says.

When asked about seeking medical help, McGeer says that people are the most ill during the first two to three days. "After this, you should see a doctor if you start to feel much worse, if the fever comes back or gets higher, or if you get pain and have difficulty breathing.

"The flu can set you up for other complications. It can give asthmatics heart problems or for people over 60 it can open the door for pneumonia to set in, which could become fatal."

The flu season starts sometimes between mid-November and February and lasts seven to 10 weeks, McGeer says. She predicts this winter's flu season in Toronto will start in January.

Parainfluenza Type 3 is a virus which is different from influenza, she notes. "Although it can cause fever, cough and cold symptoms like influenza, the illness is usually less severe than influenza. If an adult gets it, they are likely to get a slight fever, but not the heavier symptoms of the flu. Many people don't miss work because of it."

Both influenza and parainfluenza viruses can give children an illness called croup, McGeer says. "This infection of the upper airways can give children a barking cough and wheeze when they breathe."

TULIP BULBS DELIVERED

Chana has been hospitalized in the cardiology department at Shaare Zedek Medical Center since November's terrorist bombing in the Machane Yehuda market. Many people have come to visit her, among them representatives of Friends of Israel from Holland. They presented her with tulip bulbs. The Dutch Friends have donated 50,000 tulip bulbs to Israel, in honor of the Jubilee celebrations.

Developing a positive model for aging experience

By FRANCI ANN WILLIAMS
Special to The CJN

I want to share with you my own experiences and feelings about aging. Like many of us, my fear of aging, death and dying has increasingly dominated my consciousness the older I have become.

Every new wrinkle was a cause of alarm and depression. Every name forgotten was a sign of failing abilities. Will I still be attractive to my partner? How will I feel about my sexuality? Will I be a burden on my children?

Our society drives and perpetuates this fear continually, by offering very limited opportunities to offset this extremely negative view of getting older. We are bombarded by images of youthfulness, health, thinness, and economic production. We are told that the answers to aging lie in plastic surgery, aerobics, drugs and dieting. The "anti-aging" industry is worth billions, and growing.

We are never told to celebrate our age or to take pride in every birthday as an accomplishment, as a source of achievement. And we are certainly never told that our later years hold important challenges and responsibilities – with the possibilities of more meaningful and fulfilling roles than we may have ever had in the past.

Rarely do we see images of an enlightened concept of aging. In fact, the two models of aging are firstly, one of disease, frailty, uselessness and dependence; and secondly, one of older people who act and look young – called "successful aging." Both are extremes, and both stereotypes.

Thomas Cole points out in The Journey of Life that the successful aging model gives priority to physical health as the plan to salvation, but leaves out the spiritual dimension. He says that modern gerontology treats aging as a problem of social engineering to be solved through technological means. This one-sided drive to alter, reverse, or somehow control the biological process of aging actually impoverishes its meaning. So-called positive aspects of aging turn out to be disguised efforts to restore youth, rather than attempts to appreciate growing old as an important and fundamental part of human existence.

As a social gerontologist, I am trained to fix things that go wrong. That's important, but nowhere in my training has the art of aging, the creativity of aging ever been alluded to.

From this position of despair, I discovered a new perspective on aging, a revolutionary paradigm that has not only offered me a positive direction, but also opens up the aging experience to be a transformative one, of living a life of joy, meaning, service and love. In short, to become more of who we are – our authentic selves – rather than society's expectations of who we should be.

Following Cole, Mark Gerzon, writes in Listening to Midlife, that we must not become casualties of the anti-aging epidemic. "The virus of aging slowly, is itself aging us. We are getting old trying to stop it. It is our responsibility to live a deeper truth: that aging has meaning. Old is not a dirty word."

In elderhood, we can derive our identity more from the level of being, rather than doing. As we become more contemplative, we can rely less on finding self-worth through our performance/status in the work world. Gradually, we find another dimension opening up in which our identity comes, not from what we do, but from what we are, from being rather than doing.

In lives dedicated to inner growth and development, our physical appearance ceases to be as important.

"Spiritual eldering" offers a new model of aging whose goals are to reclaim and transform our elder years from our socialized notions of aging as useless to valued, from empty and alienated to involvement, fulfilment and meaning. Spiritual eldering seeks to reverse society's ageist attitudes so that we may live our older years as vital, dynamic and useful, complete human beings. And this is a radical departure from the successful aging model that perpetuates the "young at any cost and at any age" perspective.

Based on Rabbi Zalman Schachter Shalomi and Ronald Miller's book, From Age-ing to Sage-ing: A Profound New Vision of Growing Older, (Warner Books, 1995) spiritual eldering is a psycho-spiritual model of development that enables older people to complete their life journey, harvest the wisdom of their years and transmit a legacy to future generations. The Spiritual Eldering Institute in Philadelphia offers strategies, suggestions, exercises and philosophies for this renewal. Spiritual Eldering Workshops initiate and prepare us for the work of being an elder.

Elders or sages draw on growth techniques from modern psychology and contemplative techniques from the world's spiritual tradition to expand their consciousness and develop wisdom. Sages express this wisdom as consecrated service to the community. In turn, this fills their lives with meaning.

Then what are elders? According to Reb Zalman, they are wisdom-keepers who have an ongoing responsibility for maintaining society's well-being, and safeguarding the health of our ailing planet. They are pioneers in consciousness, people who practise contemplative arts from our spiritual traditions to open up greater intelligence for their late-life vocations. Using tools for inner growth, such as meditation, journal writing, and life review, elders come to terms with their mortality, harvest the wisdom of their years, transmit a legacy to future generations and prepare for death. Serving as mentors, they pass on the distilled essence of their life experience to others.

Eldering implies that we take active responsibility for our destiny in old age, living by conscious choice rather than social expectation.

In Jewish tradition, our older years are particularly a time of quest for a life of meaning. This message is embodied in the concept of mitzvah. Through mitzvah, or religious obligation, the older Jew can achieve a profound sense of self-worth and social value.

Abraham Joshua Heschel suggested that it is through being obligated that one truly exists. Older adults who believe that they are still obligated, see themselves engaged in the central human task of tikun olam: repairing and redeeming the world through observing the mitzvah. In turn, this practice shows them that their actions matter, that they can transcend the narrow confines of their current lives, which may have been influenced by the debilitating messages from the culture around them.

Thus, spiritual eldering affirms and nurtures the potential of elders, encouraging and teaching them to become more aware of the wisdom from their life experience, and to use this wisdom for the benefit of themselves and others. There is a special purpose to this stage of our life cycle which is unique and different from the other stages.

And I, like Betty Friedan, (The Fountain of Age) began this quest with my own denial and fear of age. For Friedan it ends with acceptance, affirmation, and celebration.

I'm not quite there yet, but I do look forward to every birthday with gratitude and pride, and yes, a lot more fun too.

New detection strategies help fight cancer

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — New approaches to early cancer detection could put real meaning into the word cure, says leading American cancer researcher Dr. David Sidransky.

He was in Toronto recently to receive The Alton Ochsner Award Relating Smoking and Health, presented by the American College of Chest Physicians. The award is accompanied by a cheque for $15,000 (US).

Early detection strategies, he says, are for those who have "failed in primary prevention, such as people who smoke, or may have had cancer in the past," Sidransky says. Early detection is enhanced when doctors can identify the smallest possible lesion that they can possibly detect."

At this point, Sidransky says, the cancer "is almost entirely, completely curable."

These advances in early detection have taken place at the Head and Neck Cancer Research facility at Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine, where former Canadian Dr. Barry Trink also works.

Much of the research focuses on the understanding that cancers are driven by genetic changes. Research has shown that "it takes a variety of genetic mutations in the DNA of a cell to become a full-blown cancer," Sidransky said.

Sidransky says his approach allows for a much closer look at lesions on the body that are minimally abnormal. Generally speaking, he says, such lesions would have been left alone by the medical profession in the past.

"In the bodily fluid, for example, we can detect the first cancer cells that are coming off a lesion at the point where they are still very small, and can be cured.

Work in genetics, he says, allows for the identification of genes that are necessary for the progression of the cancer cells.

Sidransky's work is seen as a major step from past approaches.

"They didn't know what to look for. They saw red or white lesions, but they had no idea which ones were going to progress. They understood the pathology, but the pathology wasn't very good at telling them what was going on," says Sidransky, whose major breakthroughs are in the field of smoking-related cancers, predominantly in the head and neck, throat, voice box and lungs.

"This is all a consequence of the molecular revolution, which is about 10 years old."

Sidransky offers cautious optimism as to how the average patient should interpret new discoveries.

"You have to be a little bit careful…The majority of the work that this award is based on is really all laboratory pre-clinical work and some clinical work."

In general though, patient education and awareness is increasing. "Patients now are becoming increasingly adept, especially through the Internet, at being able to understand things that are coming forward. And from that point of view, patients should be aggressive, and should bring those things forward to their doctors…It may precede a physician's knowledge by a year or more sometimes.

"Also, patients must listen to their doctors, and work to understand whether their situation fits the various clinical tests that are being conducted. They may not be candidates," says Sidransky.

Breakthrough transplant medicine

By MICA SCHNEIDER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Patients in need of tissue and organ transplants are one step closer to receiving laboratory-produced replacements, as a result of a breakthrough made by a team of American and Israeli scientists.

In January, the scientists became the first to extract human embryonic stem cells – the parent cells of all tissues in the body – and the first to trigger continual cell division. If programmed correctly, this cell division will develop into human tissues and allow scientists to create, from a petri dish, anything from human heart muscle to bone marrow and skin.

The advance is expected to benefit transplant medicine, drug discovery and basic developmental biology. Doctors may use it in the future to treat victims of heart disease, diabetes, Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases, spinal cord injuries and some kinds of cancers.

"Although a great deal of research needs to be done before these cells can lead to human therapies, I believe that in the long run they will revolutionize many aspects of transplant medicine," said James Thomson, a developmental biologist at the University of Wisconsin at Madison and the head of an international research team that published news of the scientific breakthrough in the Nov. 6 issue of the journal Science.

Joseph Itskovitz, an Israeli in-vitro fertilization specialist and a member of the medical faculty at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa, joined Thompson's collaboration efforts two years ago and provided the study with embryos and research assistance.

New Year's Resolution - I'm Tired Of Being Single!

For Toronto's premier and most unique dating service January is traditionally one of the busiest months of the year. That's the word from Rob Singer, founding President of The Jewish Singles Registry (JSR). After all the company parties, singles dances, and New Year's Eve parties people are tired and fed up says Singer. "By this time they begin asking themselves whether there is a better way to meet people." This is where the JSR comes in.

The JSR has been leading the way in the Toronto Jewish singles scene for over six years now. Members get to select for themselves who they would like to meet by viewing hundreds of profiles (all of which include photographs) and in some cases there are also voice personal messages. Members need only to inform JSR staff who they are interested in meeting and from there plans are set into motion to get the pair together.

PERSONAL SERVICE IS THE JSR'S FORTE

It's the personal service that sets the JSR apart from other services. Members can count on Registry staff for support, opinions, advice, and feedback. Some members on the other hand prefer to go it all alone, knowing full well that help is there if they need it. At the JSR the member customizes how the service will work for them. A large number of JSR couples are now engaged and married thanks to the dedication and recommendations of staff.

WWW.JMATCH.COM THE FUTURE IS HERE

Jmatch, The Jewish Interactive Dating Service has taken the Toronto Jewish singles scene by storm. Working with the JSR, Jmatch has quickly gained notice as being one of the fastest growing Jewish dating services in Toronto. Visitors can now log onto the site, and after filling out a brief questionnaire gain access to profiles of over 1200 Jewish singles world wide from the comfort and convenience of their own home or office computer. Hundreds of Toronto singles have already registered with www.jmatrch.com. It's convenience, ease of use and 24 hour a day accessibility make it one of the most popular services of its kind. Joining the JSR includes FREE membership to Jmatch.

THREE MORE ENGAGEMENTS

"Three more couples have recently announced their plans to walk down the aisle" reports Singer. "We have many more couples in serious relationships at the moment so be prepared to hear about diamond rings being purchased in the near future, setting the tone for an exciting 1999.

Let the JSR help you start the new year on the right track. Call the JSR at (416) 483-4151, e-mail them at jsreg@total.net, or log onto the Jmatch site at www.jmatch.com.

Studio 2 and Diplomatic Immunity host

Steve Paikin blissed out at TVO 'dream job'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Steve Paikin is sitting pretty.

The perky 38-year-old Toronto broadcaster has what he regards as "the dream job."

He co-hosts Studio 2 and hosts Diplomatic Immunity, TVOntario's highly regarded current affairs programs.

On these shows, broadcast daily and weekly respectively, Paikin has the freedom to roam far and wide and to probe the issues of the day with passion and intelligence.

When he is co-hosting Studio 2 with Paula Todd, a woman who combines beauty with brains, he delves into political, social and economic matters, touches on cultural trends and discusses the latest developments in the world of sports.

When he is hosting Diplomatic Immunity, he and his panel of experts, examine and analyze international affairs.

"This is what I had been waiting to do," he said. "This what I had been preparing for."

What he means is that his position at TVOntario is the culmination of a career that began in print journalism at The Hamilton Spectator and segued into private radio and public television in Toronto.

Before joining TVOntario in 1992, Paikin – an arts graduate of the University of Toronto (U of T) and the recipient of a master's degree in broadcast journalism from Boston University – served an apprenticeship as a summer intern at the Spectator.

Until then, he admitted, he was hardly interested in general news, rarely read the front page of a newspaper, and almost exclusively confined his reading to the sports section.

After a three-year stint as a city hall reporter for CHFI radio, he joined the CBC. He was a general reporter, a Queen's Park correspondent, a host of news and current affairs programs on Newsworld and the anchor of CBC at Six.

Once in a while, he filled in for Knowlton Nash on The National. "That was really cool. I anchored The National on the night the Soviet Union died."

For all the opportunities he had at the CBC, Paikin hungered for something more, a job where he could exercise his intellectual curiosity, transcend cursory headlines and give free rein to his effervescent personality.

He found what he wanted at TVOntario. He was hired by none other than its president, Peter Herndorff, who recently announced he was quitting.

"It's the kind of a place where, if you've got a good idea and it's not outrageously expensive, they let you do it," said Paikin, the father of three sons.

Shortly after coming aboard, he produced an award-winning documentary, Return to the Warsaw Ghetto, which he describes as his proudest achievement (and which will be aired on the Women's Channel on Feb. 21).

Last September, he and a colleague, Dan Dunsky, talked Studio 2's executive producer, Doug Grant, into turning its regular foreign affairs segment into a fullblown show, Diplomatic Immunity, whose panelists include Janice Stein, a professor at the U of T and Richard Gwyn, a columnist for the Toronto Star.

Paikin usually does not stray too far from TVOntario's headquarters in midtown Toronto, where he works out of a small corner office adorned with family photographs and occasionally rattled by a passing subway.

But from time to time, he leaves town. Last year, for instance, he turned in a story on Kirkland Lake's Jewish community and its old cemetery, and covered a strike at a gold mine in Red Lake. During his rookie year, he went to the Balkans, which has been convulsed by ethnic strife since the early 1990s.

Paikin firmly believes that no where else but at TVOntario could he be pursuing this eclectic journalistic agenda.

"Yes, it's a unique job. It simply doesn't exist at any other network in Canada. It combines hard and soft journalism, documentaries in the field and out and out kibitzing."

To prepare for interviews, Paikin spends his days reading and consulting contacts. He and Todd, a lawyer by training, pitch ideas to Grant. He defers to Grant's judgment. "If they left it up to me, I'd be doing one-hour features on the Hamilton Tiger Cats!" joked Paikin, a self-professed sports nut.

Born and raised in Hamilton, Paikin is the oldest son of Larry and Marnie. His father, who was in the steel business, buys and sells railway cars and locomotives, and his mother, whom he calls a "super woman," is a former president of the Hamilton Philharmonic Orchestra and of the board of Southam newspapers. Paikin's brother, Jeff, is a home builder in Burlington.

Paikin gravitated toward journalism after considering teaching. In his freshman year at university, he discovered U of T Radio. He covered hockey and football, and loved it. "That's when the light bulb went on. That's when I decided I wanted to be a broadcast journalist."

He doesn't know what the future holds in store. "I have no five-year plans. I work day to day." But this much seems clear: Paikin is blissed out at TVOntario.

Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

The Gumputz apartment at the Lower East Side Tenement Museum at 97 Orchard Street. The apartment is set up the way it looked in 1878. The Gumputzes were a family of German Jews.

EAST SIDE TENEMENT A HISTORIC MONUMENT

An Orthodox Jewish garment presser from Lithuania, Abraham Rogarshevsky was only 45 years old when he succumbed to tuberculosis in July 1918. He died at home, surrounded by his family in their tiny three-room apartment on New York's Lower East Side.

Although there was nothing particularly remarkable or historic about Rogarshevsky – no more than there might be about any ordinary person chosen at random – the apartment where he drew his last breath has been turned into a permanent shrine to his memory.

The Rogarshevskys lived at 97 Orchard St., a rare and perhaps unique example of a 19th-century tenement building known to have survived into modern times. Ten years ago, the six-storey building was transformed into the Lower East Side Tenement Museum.

Recently the Rogarshevsky apartment was transformed into a permanent exhibit called Sitting Shiva with the Rogarshevskys, which will be seen by tens of thousands of visitors each year.

In 1929, the landlord closed off the five upper floors of 97 Orchard St. rather than comply with a city bylaw requiring costly improvements to the plumbing and ventilation. Until 1981, various businesses operated legally on the ground level of the building while the many small apartments upstairs languished in the dust and darkness.

The building was rediscovered in the mid-1980s by two New York City historians, Ruth Abram and Anita Jacobson.

"We had been looking for months for a place to have a tenement museum," says Abram. "We had given up because the 1929 law meant that landlords all over the city had torn down, renovated or gutted their buildings."

Until they found 97 Orchard St., Abram had been all but convinced that such once-common tenements, which she calls "urban log cabins," had disappeared entirely from the metropolitan landscape.

Chartered in 1988, the Lower East Side Tenement Museum offers local walking tours, exhibits, dramas and slide shows, as Abram, its founding director, seeks funds to restore its upper floors.

Flashlight in hand, she shines a light up the dark and creaky staircase. Upstairs, the light reveals a maze of small rooms with multiple layers of peeling wallpaper, mantleshelves coated in dust, and cobwebs hanging from the ceilings.

Unquestionably, the atmosphere is spooky and surreal. Abandoned in a corner of one room is a small tin truck, a child's wind-up toy from the Victorian era. On a doorjamb of another room, a former resident, apparently a tailor, has pencilled a sartorial enumeration of shirts, vests, jackets, trousers, blouses, dresses and skirts. At least three apartments were used as sweatshops.

In suite after grimy suite, the flashlight pierces the gloom of more than half a century, revealing subtle, almost antebellum flourishes in the decor. The building was erected in 1863, the year Lincoln was assassinated.

"This is a pre-Old Law tenement, and it's certainly rare. It was built before the Old Law of 1879, before there were any laws on the books regarding building construction. It hasn't been touched since the 1901 law requiring toilets, indoor water, airshafts and ventilating windows," Abram explains.

Roughly 7,000 people from 20 nations lived at 97 Orchard St. Although Jews comprised the largest groups of residents, many non-Jewish families of Irish, Romanian, German, African and other ethnic backgrounds lived in the tenement.

So far, four apartments have been restored as authentic period exhibits. They belonged to the Confinos, a Sephardi Jewish family from Turkey; the Gumpertzes, a family of German Jews; the Baldizzis, who were Italian Catholics; and the Rogarshevskys.

One apartment has been purposely left untouched to highlight the extreme dilapidation into which the building had fallen. On the ground floor, a detailed model of the building shows slice-of-life pastiches of numerous immigrant families at various moments of history.

Much information about former residents came from genealogists, who used census records, ship's passenger lists and naturalization documents to piece together biographical details about the resident families. Visitors are sometimes astonished to discover that their own ancestors are mentioned in a list of known former tenants.

Two months ago, President Bill Clinton signed a congressional bill designating the museum as a national historic area. It is the only tenement to be preserved in the United States.

Adults, $8. Advance bookings recommended. 212-431-0233.

Guidebook examines New York's eclectic architecture

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

To the occasional visitor, the vast metropolis of Manhattan seems all of one piece, as though it sprung into being all at once, with no evolution whatsoever.

Travellers wishing to gain a better sense of the architectural background and history of this great American metropolis should consult The Architectural Guidebook to New York City (Peregrine Smith, 1998) by Francis Marrone with photographs by James Iska.

As one of the world's great cities, New York is a major architectural proving ground, possessing an extraordinary diversity of extremely worthy and unworthy experiments that alternately grace or haunt the streetscape.

Marrone's guidebook gives us better perspectives on many of these buildings than the cramped perspectives to which we are often limited.

What is Manhattan but a collection of architecture? Marrone celebrates the best pieces of this collection, and denigrates the more unfortunate additions. For instance, she declares the Waldorf Astoria, on Park between 49th and 50th, as "New York's grandest hotel by far." Alternately, she scorns the former Pan Am Building on Park Avenue: "If for no other reason than its bulk, this is a loathsome building."

Marrone does not hesitate to kick certain sacred cows of modernism including the spiral-shaped Guggenheim Museum: "The central point of the Guggenheim is that it totally ignores its setting." The Lincoln Center, meanwhile "made no sense in the 1960s (and)... makes no sense now," yet still wins her begrudging admiration.

Marrone points out the everyday glory in buildings like the New York Public Library and the Grand Central Terminal, which are situated several blocks apart along Fifth Avenue.

Noting the high stucco ceiling, large arched windows and fine furnishings of the library's Main Reading Room, she calls it "the best room in New York."

Virtually every building of note in Manhattan (and Brooklyn), whether of Greek Revival, Gothic Revival, Romanesque Revival, High Victorian, Italianate, Beaux-Arts, Art Nouveau or Art Deco design, is included.

Also included are numerous Judaic landmarks, including the 92nd St. Y ("as important a cultural institution as New York possesses" and the Central Synagogue at Lex and 55th ("a stately presence on an otherwise drab stretch of Lexington Avenue").

While readers will not always agree with Marrone's perceptions and sometimes sketchily expressed opinions, her guidebook should help visitors see the bustling streets of New York with new – and more appreciative – eyes.

Jewish angst in 1937

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's All True, by Jason Sherman, is a good play for theatre lovers, particularly those who like a strong Jewish angle.

After all, the writer of The Cradle Will Rock, which was the inspiration for Sherman's play, was Marc Blitzstein; and the 1937 era it invokes on Broadway is full of Jewish angst.

Thus, two of the four protaganists are Jewish, including actor Howard da Silva (played by Martin Julien). In response to a query about why so many Jews compose music, da Silva acidly observes that besides acting as money lenders, Jews need a hobby to fill their time.

It's All True almost, but not quite, kills the illusion that Cradle Will Rock was locked out of a Broadway theatre becaue it was pro-union and anti-capitalist.

Instead, Sherman's thesis is that it was the egos and emotions of the actors and the producer (John Houseman) and the director (Orson Welles), rather than the political currents, which were at fault.

It led to Blitzstein's play being staged in another theatre without elaborate sets, and with the actors speaking and singing from their seats in the audience, and a lone piano player, to avoid vetos by the musicians' union and Equity.

This near brilliant ensemble production, directed by Richard Rose, is not claimed by playwright Sherman to be all true. But even if one wonders if Blitzstein was really a homosexual, and wrote Cradle Will Rock as an apology to his dead wife, the thrust of the play, a co-production of Necessary Angel and Tarragon is valid. It runs in the mainspace until Feb. 7.

This critic thinks Tom McCamus should have played Blitzstein as more of a sharp New Yorker, the quality that imbued Julien's performance as da Silva. Was da Silva's championing of the rights of workers, an essential element of The Cradle Will Rock, really undercut by his dalliance with cast member Melody Johnston?

This is a point that theatre historians may well argue, especially those who think that Washington decided to withdraw funds from the project because it was so anti-capitalist.

Whether you agree with Sherman's version or not, the acting of Victor Ertmanis as Welles, Johnston as Olive and Eva Blitzstein, Tamara Bernier as the stage manager and Welles' wife, and Richard Binsley as Houseman, in addition to those already mentioned, make It's All True worth seeing.

JEWISH LIFE IN THE MIRROR OF SONG

Yiddishland Cafe: The Workmen's Circle presents A Jewish Life in the Mirror of Song, a Yiddishland Cafe evening featuring a program of Yiddish folk songs reflecting the Jewish culture of pre-war eastern Europe. Singers Miriam Eskin and John Botten of the Jewish Folk Choir are accompanied by Nina Shapilsky on piano. Jan. 24, 7:30 p.m., 471 Lawrence Ave. W. Doors open 7 p.m. Tickets $12 in advance, $15 at the door. 635-0720 or 787-2081.

Glorious Gershwin: The Royal Conservatory of Music celebrates the works of composer George Gershwin and his contemporaries in a concert on Jan. 21, 8 p.m. Porgy and Bess and the original two-piano version of Rhapsody in Blue are among the works featured.

A corresponding lecture, hosted by the CBC's Rick Phillips, focuses on Gershwin's life and music, Jan. 14, 7:30 p.m.

Tickets to the concert are $15 and $10. Tickets to the lecture are $10 and $8, or half price if bought with concert tickets. Royal Conservatory of Music, 273 Bloor St. W. 408-2824.

Theatre Notes:

• Dora award-winning theatre director Jordan Merkur (Bent, Assassins, Passion) directs a production of My Mother Said I Never Should, starring Jennifer Phipps, Jan. 15 to 31.

Described as "warm, funny and engaging," the play, which premiered in Manchester 10 years ago, explores the lives of four generations of British women, set against the enormous changes of the 20th century. $16-$22. Alumnae Theatre, 70 Berkeley St., Toronto. 366-7723.

• Jason Sherman's It's All True opened last week at the Tarragon Theatre, and runs until Feb. 7. The play focuses on a labor dispute surrounding a real-life worker's opera, The Cradle Will Rock, directed by Orson Welles, that was scheduled to open in a New York theatre in 1937. Although the play-within-the-play was closed for political reasons, it did eventually go on, thanks to some brilliant improvisations. $21-$26. 531-1827.

• The Song, a play about love, sex and the soul's journey, was inspired by the biblical Song of Songs, says playwright-director Adam Nashman. An accountant, troubled after the death of his wife, is visited by Rabbi Akiva and King Solomon. The play is produced by Theaturtle, a theatre company committed to producing "Jewish-inspired new works that speak to the soul."

Featuring Deborah Hay and Alon Nashman. Theatre Passe Muraille, 16 Ryerson Ave. Feb. 13 to March 7. 504-7529.

• The Bloor JCC presents a reading of Adam Nashman's The Song (described immediately above). 750 Spadina Ave. Mon. Jan. 18, 8 p.m. 924-6211.

• Burning Passions Theatre, a new Toronto-based venture dedicated to producing women-centred works, is seeking submissions. For details contact Laurel Smith or Jen Cohen, 651-4514; e-mail tasc@ web.net.

• Stage Centre Productions presents The Government Inspector, by Nikolai Gogol, now until Jan. 23 at Fairview Library Theatre, North York. Adults $16. 299-5557.

In the Spotlight: Feeling depressed from too many rejection letters, Toronto freelance writer-editor Bev Katz Rosenbaum recently teamed up with illustrator Patricia Storms to produce SLUSH, a new satirical 'zine (magazine) for writers.

The December issue pokes fun at many aspects of the writer's often-depressing profession, with cartoons about young writers before and after writer's school, and a comical article on Deconstructing the Rejection Letter. The cover shows what William Shakespeare would be doing if he was alive in the 1990s: He'd be slinging burgers at a greasy spoon.

If you're a "success-challenged writer in desperate need of a publication that will make me laugh [and] make me feel less alone," consider subscribing to SLUSH, which comes out in hand-drawn, foolscap format every two months. $20/year. For subscription details, phone 545-0700.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fifth annual Purim Art Contest .

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 25. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 11, 1999. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 18, 1999.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 25, 1999. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Israel & the Jewish World

France addresses wartime role

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Jean Matteoli commission, charged with identifying property seized from French Jews during World War II, will soon publish its second report.

The new report will focus on approximately 12 million francs, as well as large amounts of jewelry and other valuables confiscated from Jews at the Drancy transit camp on their way to Auschwitz.

The property was handed over to the government's Bureau of Deposits and Consignments (Caise des Depots et Consignations); most of it was later transferred to the French treasury.

Pierre Saragoossi, himself a Holocaust survivor, is in charge of confiscated property at the Bureau. Speaking with the weekly Tribune Juive, he revealed that his office has 27,000 receipts for Jewish property from the Seine district alone.

Serge Klarsfeld

The government is holding about half of the listed property because the owners or their heirs have not petitioned for its return.

Later this month, the Matteoli commission will publish a list of 7,400 cases from districts throughout France, which only represents a minor portion of the money and property taken from French Jews.

A small portion of this property was transferred to Germans, but most of it stayed in French hands.

According to the first report of the Matteoli Commission, issued last January, 62,400 cases of confiscated land property and businesses (taken from about 90,000 Jews) have been identified so far in Vichy government archives and in the archives of the General Commission for Jewish Questions, which operated during the German occupation.

Last month, a committee investigating allegations that the city of Paris is still holding a large number of real estate properties belonging to Jews, reported that just 1.3 percent of all property transferred to the city during the war belonged to Jews, and that there were only "a few isolated incidents" in which the city did not pay compensation to Jewish property owners.

Several weeks ago, Jewish organizations held talks in New York aimed at consolidating a global strategy for the return of stolen Jewish property in 15 countries.

French representatives at the meeting requested that the World Jewish Congress – which is leading the struggle – show restraint in dealing with France in order to best meet its goals.

"You must understand that this is a [special] French problem," said Henri Hajdenberg, an administrator of CRIF (the umbrella organization representing French Jews). Hajdenberg stressed that educating the French people about their World War II past takes precedence over compensating Jews for confiscated property.

The appeal for a moderate approach toward France is motivated by two current trends in French politics and society: the French have only recently begun to come to terms with their country's behavior during the German occupation and the French right wing has grown more extreme, as can be seen in the strength of Jean-Marie Le Pen's National Front party.

The famous Nazi-hunter Serge Klarsfeld, who was also part of the French delegation in New York, spoke openly about "anti-Semitism's deep roots in France.... It is a French problem and we need to deal with this complex situation."

His words reflect Jewish sensitivity to public opinion. French Jews appear wary of the impact of heavy pressure on France to return Jewish property.

They expressed concern that the fight over property could overwhelm and obscure the human tragedy of the Holocaust.

Jean-Marie Le Pen

This fear has increased in light of recent cracks in the French myth cultivated for more than 50 years, that the vast majority of French people actively resisted the Nazi oppressor and that only a small minority cooperated with the Germans.

It's not easy for the French to let go of this myth, which is an essential component of their self-image. The theft of Jewish property during the war is substantially at odds with the heroic national self-image.

This sensitivity is clearly expressed by Professor Shmuel Trigano of the University of Nanterre, in the title of his study, France Faces its Past – French Jews Face an Uncertain Future, which was published by the World Jewish Congress.

Trigano emphasizes that the current questions about the fate of Jewish property are tied to the soul searching by the French in the '90s concerning the period of German occupation.

Approximately 75,000 Jews from France (including about 40,000 who did not hold French citizenship) were killed during the Holocaust. Many of these Jews were turned in by French clerks and policemen who collaborated with the Germans.

But it must also be noted that 75,000 French Jews were saved from destruction "thanks to the aid of various sectors of French society," writes Trigano. The fate of the Jews in France during the Holocaust was determined by both the scope of the French Resistance and the extent of French collaboration with the Nazis.

The Jewish community became an integral part of French society after the war, but the public perception of the connection between "the Jews," "the immigrants," and "the foreigners," threatens to wreck this integration, according to Trigano.

"Moreover, the extreme right's anti-Semitism and hatred of foreigners effectively identifies the Jews with the immigrants.... The public debate over the memory of the Holocaust has created an ideological and symbolic connection between the Holocaust, the Jews, the immigrants and the socialists....

"Le Pen's National Front is skillfully exploiting the identification of Jews with immigrants. Behind the hostility toward immigrants from North Africa lies hostility towards Jews.

"France's political future is uncertain. The menace from the extreme right is real and is increasingly becoming the axis around which political life is organized.... Objective circumstances call into question whether the model of Jewish identity, established after World War II, will continue to exist."

Present developments may be accompanied by two parallel processes. The Jewish community may split (along religious-secular lines, as well as among the religious themselves), spelling the end of the representative body of all French Jews – the Consistoire, as it has been known since the time of Napoleon.

Instead, it would become just one of various Jewish factions. More assimilation could also occur. Most Jews are inclined to identify themselves as "French Jews" in the 19th-century meaning of the term - "which could lead to the disintegration" of French Jewry, Trigano concludes.

Dundas teen twice named school's top athlete

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The baseball season wrapped up a long time ago, but that doesn't mean Jeremy Paikin has put his glove and bat away for the winter.

Not by a long shot. When you're one of the best players in the province, and NCAA Division I schools have scouted you as a scholarship student, it's best to keep your skill levels up, Paikin figures.

So, several times a week, Paikin heads to the Etobicoke training facility of the Ontario Blue Jays, the select team operated by the Major League club for youngsters 18 and under. There, he works on his batting and defensive skills, getting ready for the spring season, which begins in March.

When he's not in a batting cage swinging for the fences, Paikin, 18, might be found working out in a gym, or on a volleyball court practising his spike, or on the hardwood shooting hoops, or on a tennis court practicing his volley.

Paikin is a six-sport athlete – it used to be more – who is so good he's twice been named athlete of the year at his school, Parkside High, in Dundas, Ont.

He's also being honored for his athletic achievements at a B'nai Brith sports celebrity dinner in Hamilton.

At six foot one, 175 pounds, he's got the size and ability to excel in a number of sports, but he's chosen baseball, followed closely by basketball, as his favorites.

Playing for his school, Paikin, a second baseman, hit a mind-boggling .720 last season, the highest in school history. But it's with the Hamilton Cobras of the Junior Intercounty League (the baseball equivalent of major junior hockey) that he's really made his mark.

The calibre of ball is as high as it gets in Canada for people his age, and it attracts its fair share of major league scouts. Playing as an underage player (most participants are 19-21), Paikin hit slightly over .330, and he led his team in fielding percentage (98 percent) in 65 games played.

Broadcasting confidence even in a telephone interview across the miles, Paikin said his average was even better in the second half of the season, once he adjusted to the faster pitches and better curve balls Intercounty pitchers can throw at you.

Paikin guestimates he hit .400 from mid-season onwards, while the league's batting champion, a 20-year-old, hit .412. And that guy plays for a NCAA Division I team during the winter, he pointed out.

Put it all together and Paikin is confident he's going to be heading south next year on a baseball scholarship. The only question is where.

He's already received several enticing offers from Division I schools, but finding the right fit is key, he said. Through friends and from personal experience, he's learned that some schools are little more than baseball factories, churning out excellent players but stressing baseball to the detriment of their academic futures.

Paikin, who boasts a 95 percent average, and who has his sights set on a career in medicine, isn't interested in taking basket-weaving courses so he can have more time to devote to baseball.

"My first ambition is a career in medicine, while remaining in athletics," he said.

More specifically, he's aiming at orthopedic surgery so he can stay in the world of sports by working with athletes facing hip and knee problems, he said.

For Paikin, sports are a natural outlet. "I play them because I love them. I love playing them hard... I've always been pretty competitive." From age 6 to 14, he played AAA hockey, the highest level for his age group, but gave it up for other sports.

Jeremy Paikin

Basketball, in particular, became his winter sport of choice. "I decided my build, my personality fit better with basketball than hockey," he said.

On his school team, he switches between shooting guard and small forward.

He shoots 61 percent from the field and averages 18.9 points per game.

Three years ago, he travelled to New Jersey for the hoops competition at the JCC/Maccabi Youth Games. Hamilton didn't send a basketball team and Toronto's was full, so he ended up playing for New Jersey.

Paikin admits that going into the tournament, he figured he'd dominate: "I didn't believe there were so many good Jewish athletes. I'd always been such a minority, the only Jewish guy on these teams."

He didn't dominate. Instead, he was impressed with LA's team and with a forward on Philly against whom he had a running battle all game long.

His other favorite sport is volleyball, but he doesn't have the time to devote to the sport to elevate him to a higher level, he concedes.

Rounding out his athletic endeavors are tennis, co-ed volleyball and track and field, sports he just enjoys playing.

Parkside's volleyball coach, Dan Thomson, called Paikin "one of my top players. He's a definite team leader."

Though volleyball isn't Paikin's number one sport, he brings a winning attitude to the team.

"He's focused and driven," Thomson said. "He likes to do well and he works hard so he can do well. He's definitely a great guy to have on the team."

When you add together all practices, games and time preparing in the gym, Paikin devotes about three to four hours a day to his sports, six, sometimes seven days a week.

Sometimes, that pushes school projects to the wee hours of the night, but that's something he's willing to put up with.

"I know these are sacrifices I have to make," he said. "My goal is to get a scholarship at a good U.S. university so they can pay for me to go to school there."

Jewish athletes have ties to 'Fighting Irish'

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — In recent years, three American Jewish high school stars attracted college coaches in droves.

One was a big, strong-armed quarterback from Fieldston School in New York City, Gus Ornstein, who was also an outstanding baseball player.

Another was a powerful football lineman, Mike Rosenthal, from Penn High School in Granger, Ind.

The third was Doug Gottlieb, a six-foot point guard from Tustin, Cal., who set a state record for assists and showed the basketball savvy expected in a family whose father was a college coach and whose older brother is an assistant coach.

Unlike most other Jewish athletes who enrol in Ivy League colleges, the trio all chose Notre Dame, the Catholic university whose athletic success has overshadowed its academic reputation for nearly 90 years.

Only one of the three remains at the South Bend campus: Rosenthal, the six-foot-seven, 300 pound offensive tackle.

As one of the his team's co-captains, he led the Irish, rated 16th and 18th in the nation by the two leading polls, against Georgia Tech in the Gator Bowl in Florida on Jan. 1. Rosenthal was one of three Jewish football players appearing in season ending bowl games.

A senior, Rosenthal is rated one of the top offensive linemen in the nation and probably will be drafted high by a NFL team. He was chosen a preseason All-America by two publications and is considered a leading candidate for the Outlined Trophy, which goes to the nation's best offensive lineman. The Associated Press named him to its second team All-America recently.

Five years ago, Ornstein was a promising freshman QB for Notre Dame, throwing a touchdown pass against Navy in the only game in which he saw action. Unfortunately, with so little playing time, it was a virtual wasted year of athletic eligibility.

As a result, Ornstein moved to Michigan State, and after sitting out a year as a transfer scholarship athlete, he started one game and was a backup during a two year stay in East Lansing, throwing for three touchdowns.

This fall, he wound up at Rowan University in Glassboro, N.J. and finally got a chance to show his ability.

Ornstein threw for 2,998 yards and 18 touchdowns in leading the Profs into the Division III championship game, the Amos Alonzo Stagg Bowl in Salem, Va.

Rowan lost to four-time champion Mount Union (Ohio) College, 44-24, as Ornstein completed 17 of 40 passes for 200 yards and a touchdown, but was sacked seven times.

For the season, Ornstein completed 226 of 394 passes for 3,198 yards and 19 touchdowns.

He and Rosenthal could wind up swapping Golden Dome memories at the NFL rookie combine in Indianapolis, because Ornstein's arm and six-foot-four, 229-lb frame is still considered "major league" by many scouts. He also is considered major league in baseball as a switch-hitting first baseman.

In 1994, Ornstein was drafted by Seattle in the 20th round and drafted again, in the 40th round, by San Diego in 1997. He now is property of the New York Yankees.

The third "Jewish Fighting Irishman," Gottlieb started at point guard for the basketball team three years ago as a freshman.

He too transferred after one year, played in the Maccabiah Games while sitting out a junior college and moved into the starting lineup at Oklahoma State University (OSU)last season. Gottlieb directed the team to a 21-5 record, averaging 6.9 assists (an OSU record) and 5.4 points per game, making honorable mention on the Big 12 All-Star team and being named "conference newcomer of the year."

This year, the Cowboys are ranked in the top 20 teams in the nation, and the 6-1 team leader already has set a school record with 18 assists in one game.

The Inside Back

Mission: Shekalim in action

By JORDAN MAX

DECEMBER 2018 (JMA) — The first Israeli UJA mission to North America recently returned from its successful, groundbreaking visit.

Last Laugh

Its threefold mandate was to see where its shekalim went, to gain insight into the current quality of Jewish life in North America, and to strengthen it through promotion of Israelism and Jewish education.

To aid its cultural goals, the mission was staffed by a crack team of Jewish Agency analysts, cultural interpreters and political party apparachik. Accompanying the mission, the "Golden Oldies" Naomi Shemer-Yoram Gaon tour played to sold-out audiences of baby boomer seniors.

According to the mission leader, Foreign Affairs Minister Dana International, the mission had its roots 20 years earlier at the 1998 General Assembly (GA) of UJA Federations meeting in Jerusalem, where GA delegates first heard of the start-up of an Israeli version of the UJA/UIA program, including a call by then-prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu for Israel to take the lead in providing Jewish education for the Diaspora.

As the years passed, Israel became economically self-sufficient and refused to take any more tzedakah from the shrinking Diaspora. This feat was made even more possible by the 2015 signing of the 12th armistice between the People's Republic of Palestinia Arafatia and Israel.

Members toured the vast North American landscape of current and former Jewish life. Those delegation members who agreed to be interviewed had mixed reviews of the current state of North American Jewry.

Visiting summer camps for overprivileged children, delegates observed the sad predicament of children forcibly deprived of MTV, Nintendo and shopping malls for the entire summer, who were now being compelled into sharing accommodation, exercising and enjoying country air.

The delegation offered tips on soccer and basketball, organizing campers into numerous political, religious and social organizations, and assistance in setting up a coalition Campers Council and holding frequent elections. Israeli Jewish education was stressed, based on the central values of dollarim, materialism and "just feeling Jewish."

Delegates who had visited religious camps reported they had been delighted to learn how to daven and to bensch after meals, and stated that they would possibly consider participating in a minyan, should the need ever arise.

One of the most moving moments came on the visit to the Museum of the Lost Tribe of American Jews in Washington, D.C., where delegates laid wreaths made of bagels and cream cheese in memory of American Jews lost to apathy, intermarriage and assimilation.

Many delegates were brought to tears while touring former Jewish centres, day schools and synagogues, which had become virtual ghost towns in only a few generations.

In the political sphere, delegates had the privilege of meeting with U.S. President Bill Gates, Vice-President Jerry Springer (whom delegates fondly remember as playing a pivotal role in mediating the Final Israeli-Palestinian Peace Accord), and various members of the Senate, whom they lobbied to protect the American-Jewish way of life.

Israeli mission members were surprised to learn that such a large population as the United States had only two national political parties. In the House of Representatives, mission staff led workshops on parliamentary decorum and learned the ins and outs of impeachment proceedings.

In joint planning sessions with local federations, who were now receiving Israeli UJA shekels, delegates reported they now enjoyed telling their new "partners" how to spend their hard-earned money.

The only embarrassing moment in the mission occurred when some of the more opinionated activists of the Israeli delegation broke away to visit Native American reservations, and held a press conference to register their criticism of American human rights violations by the resettlement of indigenous peoples, the poor treatment of minorities, and exclusionary immigration policies.

For many mission members the highlight was the opportunity to stay for Shabbat with real North American Jewish families. Stories are still circulating about the wonderful shopping and all-you-can-eat restaurant experiences, baseball games and lavish bar/bat mitzvah parties. A few delegates even reported they went to synagogue and experienced an authentic Shabbat with their adoptive families.

Plans are under way for next year's mission which will target wealthy Israeli machers and visit nationally protected Jewish enclaves of Lakewood, Toronto, and Crown Heights.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I recently had a difficult assignment to complete in history. I researched many books in the library, searched the Internet and interviewed many people. I made two rough drafts and edited this paper to death before I finished my final copy. I don't think I've ever put so much work into one assignment.

I handed in my paper with confidence and pride, knowing I would get a good mark. I got it back graded C+, and I was upset. I know the mark has nothing to do with the paper. The teacher really dislikes me. I have caused a bit of a stir in the class in the past, and our personalities have clashed. Should I say something about my grade? I don't want to make things worse, as final exams are just around the corner. What should I do?

Unhappy in History

Dear Unhappy in History,

Conflicts with teachers are always awkward, because it is necessary to deal with the issue at hand while maintaining respect for the teacher. You must decide yourself whether you should speak to your teacher about your mark. However, here are some points to keep in mind.

You worked extremely hard on this project and put in a lot of time and effort. You believe that your report was very good, for you handed it in with "pride and confidence," and that the mark should reflect more of the work that was put into it.

A second point is that no teacher has the right to give a mark on a project based on the student's behavior in class. Furthermore, a discussion with your teacher about a mark should not affect your exam mark. That would be unprofessional and unjustified.

If you are still undecided, we suggest going to the guidance department. The staff there may give you other options. For example, they may speak to the teacher themselves, or have another teacher in the history department mark your paper again.

If you are hesitant about going to guidance, consider going to another teacher with whom you feel more comfortable and talking to him or her about your dilemma.

In every case, remember to stay rational. The conflict you have with your teacher is an obstacle you must overcome. In terms of your report, do what you think is honest and fair.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto.

Former SS man admits past

Will testify to ease 'pangs of conscience'

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A former Nazi officer, who allegedly killed concentration camp inmates in cold blood, is scheduled to go on trial in Germany this spring, thanks to the testimony of a Montreal professor, who served in the Waffen SS.

Adalbert Lallier, a professor at Concordia University since 1960, was an eyewitness to the apparently wanton gunning down of at least five and possibly seven inmates of Theresienstadt, in April, 1945.

Having immigrated to Canada in 1951, Lallier had never hidden what he had witnessed. He had told the British, who held him as a prisoner of war at war's end, and the Americans with whom he later worked in resettling refugees, he said.

However, based on his recollections, it appears that both the British and the Americans were too eager to put the war they'd won behind them, and too concerned with the new threat of communism to do anything about the atrocities Lallier had witnessed.

It was only when Steve Rambam, a New York private investigator, came to Montreal in 1997 and urged anyone with knowledge of Nazi war crimes to come forward, that Lallier saw a chance to finally ease his "pangs of conscience," he said.

Rambam conducted a four-hour videotaped interview with Lallier, 73, a French Huguenot raised in Hungary. After being alerted by Rambam, the German consulate here invited the professor to give his testimony to Germany's war crimes commission.

Lallier has since travelled twice to Stuttgart – first in April, 1998 for a preliminary meeting with police, and again last August to be interviewed by the presiding judge. Lallier has been told the trial will begin in April or May, and he expects to spend at least a week in Germany testifying.

"They found the man alive and prospering in Germany. I was told he had been tried once before, but let go because of lack of witnesses," Lallier said.

According to Rambam, Julius Viel was brought to trial in 1964, but the sole testimony, an eyewitness account by another SS member, was not corroborated. Lallier's coming forward has been "critical" in having the case reopened, Rambam said.

'A lesson in understanding'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien will spend a full day touring the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp in Poland this weekend accompanied by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen, the son of a Holocaust survivor.

Chrétien's visit to the site on Jan. 24 will be the first ever paid by a Canadian prime minister.

"The prime minister is very eager to do this," Ronen said in an interview, after receiving a special invitation by the Prime Minister's Office (PMO).

"He understands the importance this has for the Jewish community. It will be very well received."

He also saw the visit as, "an opportunity to memorialize and to educate...a lesson in sensitivity and understanding."

Ronen, 40, who became CJC president last May, said he was contacted by the PMO's director of operations, Paul Sparkes, before the new year, and was invited to be an official member of the Canadian delegation.

Oil License Granted

CALGARY — Valiant Resources Ltd., a Calgary-based petroleum exploration company, has recently acquired licences to explore over 250,000 acres of land in Israel's Megiddo Valley, in the southern Galilee. Reports have shown that up to five billion barrels of oil could be accumulated. The company is expected to begin drilling operations in the coming weeks.

Poland to Reconcile?

JERUSALEM — Poland is ready for a "new chapter" in its relations with the Jewish people, the nation's president said during a visit to Israel. Aleksander Kwasniewski said Warsaw is trying to enact legislation that would govern the status of former concentration camps in his country. Such legislation could end a dispute prompted by the recent erection of hundreds of crosses at the site of the Auschwitz camp.

Appeal of Shabbat Ruling

JERUSALEM — Israel's attorney general has appealed a recent court ruling allowing a kibbutz store to operate on Shabbat. Elyakim Rubinstein launched the appeal after the court ruled in favor of Kibbutz Tzora, located on the outskirts of Jerusalem. The ruling drew strong protests from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and leaders of Israel's religious political parties.

Jews Mount Campaign

NEW YORK — A liberal U.S. Jewish group is urging American Jews to flood the Israeli embassy in Washington with phone calls to oppose any bills in the Knesset that would invalidate conversions performed by non-Orthodox rabbis and counter efforts by non-Orthodox representatives to serve on local religious councils. "It's time for American Jews to tell the Israeli government exactly what we are: Jews," the New Israel Fund said in an ad in the New York Times.

Censure Clinton: Rabbis

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Senate should censure President Bill Clinton but not hold a trial that could lead to his removal from office, a group of Jewish and Christian religious leaders urged in a letter to the Senate. Leaders of the Central Conference of American Rabbis and the Rabbinical Assembly, which represent U.S. Reform and Conservative rabbis respectively, were among those signing the letter.

Records on Nazis

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton has created a working group to make all classified U.S. records relating to Nazi war criminals available to the public as soon as possible. Several cabinet officials, including Defence Secretary William Cohen and Attorney General Janet Reno, were named to the group.

Rabbi Indicted for Murder

CAMDEN, N.J. — A grand jury in New Jersey has indicted a rabbi in the 1994 murder of his wife. The indictment alleges that Rabbi Fred Neulander hired someone to kill his wife because he was worried that their impending divorce would disclose his adultery. The rabbi is charged with murder and conspiracy to commit murder. He pleaded not guilty to the charges and remains free on $400,000 bail.

Record Tours of House

AMSTERDAM — A record number of visitors toured the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam last year. More than 822,000 people visited the house where the teenage diarist and her family hid from the Nazis, a 16 percent increase over 1997. Officials attributed the increase to publicity surrounding the recent publication of newly discovered pages from Frank's diary.

Security Considered

FRANKFURT — Police in Berlin are considering installing video cameras at five Jewish cemeteries, following an attack on a former German Jewish leader's grave last month. The move is among several security measures authorities are weighing following the bombing of the tombstone of Heinz Galinski, the immediate past president of Germany's Jewish community.

Mass For Fascist

ZAGREB — A Roman Catholic mass was recently conducted here to honor the memory of Ante Pavelic, the leader of the State of Croatia during World War II. The Ustasha government of Croatia collaborated with Nazi Germany, and carried out a program of genocide and forced conversion of Serbs, Jews and Gypsies. Efraim Zuroff, Israeli director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, called the religious services "a mockery of the victims, an insult to the survivors...and all those who opposed his brutal regime. Such services will only encourage those who seek the rebirth of the Ustasha fascist ideology espoused by Pavelic and his cohorts. They represent the antithesis of democracy and human rights."

'Watergate' Hits Barak's Campaign

WASHINGTON — Did opponents of Israeli Labor Party leader Ehud Barak stage a Watergate-style break-in at the Washington offices of a U.S. polling firm working on his campaign for prime minister?

The question gripped Israel last week after burglars snatched confidential files and petty cash from Greenberg Quinlan Research Inc., which was hired as an adviser to Barak.

The firm described it as "a sophisticated break-in of a suspicious nature." District of Columbia Police and the FBI are investigating the incident.

Authorities said the burglars broke through an air conditioning vent on the roof of the Capitol Hill office, tore through the ceiling, disabled an alarm system and then opened a door, possibly to let others in.

Greenberg's firm provided no details about what was stolen, saying only that it appeared some of its international political work may have been targeted. In Tel Aviv, a Labor Party spokeswoman said materials pertaining to Barak's election campaign were stolen.

Canada, Israel join to help Guatemalan disabled

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two non-governmental organizations (NGOs), a Canadian and an Israeli one, are celebrating Israel's 50th birthday by embarking on a joint venture to help the war-shattered people of Guatemala.

The project will see the Canadian organization assist in the physical rehabilitation and community integration of people disabled during Guatemala's long civil war while the Israeli NGO will train the war's victims to become economically self-sufficient.

The joint project brings together the International Centre for the Advancement of Community Based Rehabilitation (ICACBR), located at Queen's University in Kingston, Ont., with the Development Studies Centre (DSC) in Rehovot, Israel. The project will be financed by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) and its Israeli counterpart, Mashav, an agency of the Israeli foreign ministry.

Still in its preliminary stage, the program originated with an idea by Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy, according to Benjamin Abileah, a senior advisor at Mashav. "He suggested that for Israel's 50th anniversary, Canada and Israel would mark it by doing a joint project of assistance in a developing country. This appealed to us very much."

Two senior ICACBR officials recently reported about the project at a meeting of the executive of the Canada Israel Committee, the Jewish community's pro-Israel lobby group. They spoke to The CJN afterward.

Malcolm Peat, executive-director of ICACBR, said representatives of the two NGOs travelled to the Guatemalan provinces of Quiche and Coban in late November to scout locations for the project and to meet with potential Guatemalan partners. Once preliminary evaluations are complete in about four months, work will begin on establishing at least two community programs, he said.

Canadian clinicians and educators will travel to Guatemala to assist in rehabilitation. They will also meet with the families of those disabled as well as the broader Guatemalan public to educate them about the skills retained by the injured and better integrate them into the community, said Lorna Jean Edmonds, administrative officer for ICACBR.

Many Guatemalans, including skilled and educated people, were injured during the conflict. Unlike those born with disabilities, who often are marginalized at a young age, these people have recently been thrust into a victimized group. There is now an opportunity to work with these people to raise awareness in Guatemala about others who suffer from disabilities, she said.

The role of the DSC is to help in the economic recovery of the disabled, said Dafna Schwartz, the organization's director general.

"Israel has a lot of experience, unfortunately, with disabled people, mostly from the army," Schwartz said in an interview from Israel. "We have a lot of experience integrating them into economic life again and getting them back as productive members of society.

"That's the basis of the cooperation between Israel and the Canadian side."

Schwartz said the DSC has specialized in economic development throughout Africa and Asia for more than 30 years. It holds courses for professionals in host countries and often local educators are brought to Israel for further training before returning to their home countries to manage programs.

The Israeli-Canadian connection and the credibility they bring to the project should loosen the purse strings of Guatemalan development banks to help fund local business initiatives, Peat said.

For the time being, Mashav's involvement in the program is slated to last two years, said Abileah, who served as consul-general in Toronto from 1987-89. Approximately $100,000 will be allocated to the venture in its first year.

Compensation slashed for Hungarian Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews of Hungarian birth and descent in Canada are outraged that Hungary's government has slashed compensation to Holocaust survivors and relatives of victims by a whopping 90 percent.

"It's nonsense...a shame," said Dr. Alexander Schreiber, head of Toronto's large Hungarian Jewish community.

Earlier this month, Hungary's parliament voted to cut one-time payments to survivors and relatives

From the editor's desk

Polished, but still poison

It has been my policy not to respond to articles unfairly critical of Israel, or of significance in some other way to the debates surrounding Israel that appear in the press, magazines or in other journals. There are simply too many of such pieces around. To concern myself with rebutting or commenting on all of the ones brought to my attention would leave little time or space to write about other subjects.

That policy however, has built-in exceptions.

There are certain articles, the publication of which raise such important issues, that they must meet with a response.

Two weeks ago, one such piece appeared in the Sunday New York Times Magazine. It was an essay by Edward Said, entitled The One State Solution: why the only answer to Middle East peace is Palestinians and Israelis living as equal citizens under one flag.

Said is a renowned author, scholar, professor from Columbia University who has a wide following in literary and cultural circles. A superb and skilled writer, he is, and has been for many years, one of the leading anti-Israel polemicists in the world.

Said was born in Jerusalem in 1935. He and his family fled the city in 1947, dispossessed from their home by the war thrust upon the Jews of Palestine, and by the Jews' determination that their nascent state would not die at birth.

He is vehemently opposed to the Oslo peace process. He has scorned it in harsh terms as a sellout by the PLO leadership, of historic Palestinian aspirations to return to their homes.

As a result of the Oslo signings, he has become a vocal opponent of Yasser Arafat, for whom he had always been the foremost western apologist and propagandist, and of the Arafat-led Palestinian National Council.

The article is a signature piece of writing on Israel by Said, short on history, long on half-truths, replete with elegant phrasing and polished words, but a dangerous poison nevertheless.

There are two alarming aspects to this most recent piece: its message and its vehicle.

Said urges readers to agree with him that the only viable, long-term solution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict is to dispense with the Oslo process and replace it, somehow, with a newly minted, bi-national, single state where Jews and Arabs will live together.

In effect, he advocates the dissolution of the present-day State of Israel.

But he does so in such gentle and refined language, relying heavily on familiar, western, democracy-laden concepts, sounding so impeccably modern and reasonable, that one hardly notices.

"The beginning is to develop something entirely missing from both Israeli and Palestinian realities today: the idea and practice of citizenship, not of ethnic or racial community...In a modern state all its members are citizens by virtue of their presence and the sharing of rights and responsibilities.

"Citizenship, therefore, entitles an Israeli Jew and a Palestinian Arab to the same privileges and resources. A constitution and a bill of rights thus become necessary for getting beyond Square 1 of the conflict, because each group would have the same right to self-determination, that is the same right to practice communal life in its own way, perhaps in federated cantons, with a joint capital in Jerusalem, equal access to land and inalienable secular and juridical rights. Neither side should be held hostage to religious extremists."

Couched in the ennobling credo of "citizenship" with its attendant "rights"-oriented terminology, Said's thesis would naturally sound appealing to sophisticated western audiences. It is all the more so, because he carefully travels through assiduously-crafted, Israel-associated, apartheid imagery before arriving at his seductively simple conclusion: equal rights for everybody – Israelis and Palestinians – in one non-Jewish, non-Muslim state.

There is not room in this column to comment upon the many clever devices Said uses in presenting his case. His plea is to high western values and sensibilities of morality, justice and compassion. Who among us would spurn such fundamental values?

His sensibly sounding pleading though, is a construct of half-truths, distortions and gross omissions of fact. But the pleading is only half the danger.

The other half lies in the fact that it was published, without editor's comment or annotation, in that most credible of all credible publications, the New York Times, and therefore by association, stamped with the imprimatur of reasonableness and viability.

A new, younger generation of readers, formulating their own ideas about the "tiresome" conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians, will now read Said's proposal. Among them, of course, are many Jews familiar with the terminology of citizenship but unfamiliar with the history of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

It is our responsibility to try to ensure that they do, indeed, become familiar with that history.

Only that way, will they be able to resist the Said seduction, his lifelong dream of doing away with the State of Israel.

Hungarian cuts affect Canadians of Jewish Holocaust victims. The plan, part of this year's government budget, reduces the payments by more than 90 percent – from $4,500 to $140 (US) per person.

Hungary's 100,000-strong Jewish community has called the move unconstitutional and asked the country's highest court to review it.

An estimated 25,000 Hungarian Jews worldwide could be affected, including thousands in Canada.

William Kosaras, editor of Menorah, a Toronto-based Hungarian-Jewish weekly newspaper, said many of his readers are upset and concerned at the development.

"It's a shame...more than a shame," he said.

Kosaras said a letter-writing campaign is being organized in Toronto and Montreal to implore Canadian, American and world Jewish leaders to help. Letters will be sent to Canadian parliamentarians, to U.S. Congressman Tom Lantos (a Hungarian Jewish Holocaust survivor) and to Edgar Bronfman, head of the World Jewish Congress.

Kosaras scoffed at Hungary's official explanation for the drastic cut – that it can't afford more. He said the country has earmarked over 20 billion forints (roughly $90 million) to celebrate its 1,000th anniversary as a nation this year and next.

There are roughly 10,000 Jews of Hungarian birth in Canada, he said, mostly concentrated in Toronto and Montreal. He said thousands in this country could be affected by the reduction in payments.

Andrew Lendvay, a Toronto travel agent and leader in the city's Hungarian Jewish community, said he has helped process over 2,000 claims from about 350 people in Toronto so far.

He called the dramatic reduction in payments discriminatory, pointing out that in 1992, the Hungarian parliament passed a law giving $4,500 per person in compensation to heirs of victims of the Communist regime. After opposition from Jewish groups, the law was modified in 1997, adding the heirs of those who died between 1938 and 1945 to the list of those entitled to compensation.

Last week meantime, Peter Feldmayer, president of Hungary's Jewish community, said thousands of Hungarian Holocaust survivors are eligible for German compensation following the discovery of long-lost records.

The records, recently discovered in the basement of a Budapest municipal building, prove that about 6,000 people who had applied for German life annuities were survivors of Nazi concentration camps.

Salomon defends actions of Maccabi World Union

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's been a rough 18 months for Roy Salomon and other senior officials of the Maccabi World Union (MWU). Two weeks ago in Israel, was no exception.

In a Knesset committee room, Salomon and two other MWU executives faced a hostile reception, and what Salomon termed a "staged protest," concocted to attract maximum media coverage.

The occasion was a committee hearing into the bridge collapse at the opening ceremonies of the 1997 Maccabiah Games, in which four Australian athletes were killed and dozens injured, some seriously.

Since that tragic event, Salomon and the MWU have been fighting a rear-guard action against the MWU's critics, defending the organization's conduct after the collapse, and attempting to deflect calls for the resignation of the organization's chair, Uzi Netanel, and president, Ronald Bakalarz.

The committee hearing was the most recent occasion for Salomon, president of Maccabi Canada and co-chair of MWU's North American Confederation, to sit in an uncomfortable hot seat.

The committee chair, Micha Goldman, opened the meeting by calling for the resignations of the MWU officers – a position senior MWU officials flatly reject. The chair had already gone on record voicing his opinion that the two should step down. That was quickly followed by a parade-in of three Maccabi athletes who turned in their medals.

Roy Salomon

The MWU representatives countered by pointing out that the committee chair appeared to pre-judge the issue without hearing their side, Salomon said.

The chair's remarks prompted him to set aside his prepared statement, and speak off the cuff, discussing the tragedy.

"We again expressed our concern and pointed out we...did everything we possible could to ease the [Australian] families' burden," he said.

In the aftermath of the tragedy, Maccabi personnel visited victims in hospital, made travel arrangements and provided "as much assistance as we could," he added.

Salomon also went into detail about the good work accomplished by the Maccabi organization, pointing out it is active in 57 countries, and serves as many Jews' main link to Israel and Judaism.

"I think we give our young athletes pride in their Judaism, and we bring hundreds of people to Israel who would never have come otherwise."

Salomon told The CJN that two Maccabiah Games officials have resigned in the wake of the bridge disaster – the chair of the game's organizing committee and chair of the opening ceremonies committee.

"I tell you, we see nothing that they've done that is wrong." The resignations, he continued, "were like taking moral responsibility."

Critics of the MWU, particularly the families of those killed and injured in Australia along with two major Australian Jewish organizations, have urged the top MWU officials to take responsibility for the tragedy, and resign.

Meanwhile, the Knesset committee hearings were scheduled to continue while a criminal case involving the chair of the organizing committee, an engineer and three contractors continues at a snail's pace. The case is expected to continue until May or June, and the decision will follow likely in the fall, Salomon said.

In other developments, Maccabi Australia has announced it will participate in the 2001 Maccabiah Games, while Australian members of the MWU who had resigned their positions have returned to the fold, Salomon said. "They wouldn't have done so if they didn't feel the right things were being done," he said.

Grant enables BJE to hire staff

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — A $100,000 grant from the Saul F. Wagman Fund has enabled the Jewish Board of Education (BJE) to hire a part-time consultant to coordinate family education programs in synagogues and Hebrew schools.

The grant, which was earmarked for education, was allocated through UJA Federation, says Elaine Fogel, communications associate for UJA Federation.

"Studies show that retention of Jewish education is stronger when families participate together in programs," Fogel says.

"When parents and children participate in Jewish programs together, they encourage each other to participate in Jewish rituals at home."

Synagogues and schools participating in the family education program include Temple Solel, Temple Sinai, Temple Kol Ami, Temple Har Zion, Holy Blossom Temple, Temple Emanu-el, Oraynu, Beth Tzedec, Shaar Shalom and the Downtown Jewish Community School.

The grant, says Fogel, helps the schools and synagogues expand existing programs or create new ones.

Anne Glickman, the family education coordinator with BJE who supervises the program, set up a resource centre, and says she is available for consultation. "Family education is a good way to demonstrate how Jewish observance can enrich a family."

The schools and synagogues have offered programs on such topics as Shabbat, family genealogy, ethical dilemmas and holidays, she says.

Atrocity must meet with punishment

"An unspeakable atrocity, a crime very much against humanity, horrendous and very, very serious... It looks like it was done by people who have no value for human life." Those were the words spoken last weekend by William Walker, the head of the Kosovo Verification Commission, a special committee established three months ago by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to oversee the troubled truce in Kosovo, the mostly ethnically Albanian province within Serbia trying to assert its independence from Yugoslavia.

Walker was referring to the massacre and grisly slaughter of some 45 people, all of them ethnic Albanians, whose mutilated bodies were discovered by journalists and foreign "peace" monitors, strewn like foul detritus into a stenching heap of human corpses in a mud-soaked hillside gully near the town of Racak in Kosovo.

Associated Press reported that some of the dead were found with their eyes gouged out or their heads smashed in. One victim was decapitated. Among the victims was a young woman and a 12-year-old boy. Most, however, were old men. All of them were non-combatants.

The savagery and sheer inhuman brutality of the attack numbed the senses. By all accounts, it was perpetrated by Serbian police with the backing of the Yugoslav armed forces.

The number of people killed at Racak was the highest in a single attack since the Oct. 12 peace agreement brokered by the United States with Yugoslavia. However, the fighting has escalated in recent days, and it appears the truce is shaky indeed.

One day before the discovery at Racak, at least 15 "Albanian" Kosovans were killed and two British peace monitors were shot at and wounded by Serbian Yugoslav forces.

Last month, Serbian border guards killed 36 rebel fighters as they tried to smuggle weapons into Kosovo from neighboring Albania.

According to the New York Times, as many as 2,000 people, mostly ethnic Albanians, have been killed since the Yugoslav president Slobodan Milosevic began an offensive one year ago to try to crush rebel militants and to reinforce government control of Kosovo, whose population is 90 percent ethnic Albanian.

Milosevic grudgingly agreed three months ago to the truce, only under the threat of military intervention by NATO air forces. In the wake of this latest ghastly disregard of that truce by the Yugoslav leader, that threat should be renewed. In recent days, NATO leaders have been meeting to plot new strategy against Yugoslavia. That strategy must be but one component in a firm, multi-component response by the civilized world that includes bringing the actual murderers to trial as war criminals, publicly pressuring the government of Yugoslavia at the UN, and resorting to a proportionate use of force.

The government of Canada has a role to play in fashioning that response. We commend External Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy for summoning the Yugoslav ambassador last weekend. But a summons to the Yugoslav ambassador to hear the government of Canada express its outrage should only be the beginning step, to be followed by more persuasive concrete steps.

Thus when Canada assumes a seat at the Security Council table, it must be at the forefront, seeking to impose an appropriate UN response to the brazenness of the Yugoslav government.

Atrocity must always meet with punishment. Nothing less could ever be acceptable today, more than a half century after the world decided upon rules to deal with "the people who have no value for human life," and who commit the "unspeakable."

McGuinty's support for Jewish education important

Joseph Adler's letter, "Smiles aside, opposition to Jewish school help continues," (CJN, Jan. 7) inappropriately takes to task provincial Liberal Opposition leader Dalton McGuinty, claiming McGuinty's expression of support for school funding was misleading.

The point that Adler misses entirely, is that for the first time in recent memory, a leader of one of Ontario's major political parties has gone on-the-record stating that he has no ideological opposition to ensuring public funds support Jewish day schools. This public acknowledgement of support comes at a time when the provincial government, under a new funding formula, is completely responsible for the funding of education in Ontario. While Canadian Jewish Congress understands that politicians often say many things, especially near election time, such statements from party leaders philosophically supporting the funding of Jewish day schools, are a necessary first step in achieving our goal under these new circumstances.

As well, Adler should realize that when a provincial party leader such as McGuinty addresses the executive of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, we welcome him into our home, the Lipa Green Building – the living room for Ontario's Jewish community. We treat our guests with respect, while at the same time, ensuring that they are fully aware of all our concerns, be it funding for our Jewish day school system, anti-racism initiatives or the need to ensure that our social safety net remains secure.

Supplementary schools needed to fill gap

Re: Report on value of supplementary schools (CJN, Nov. 19).

Supplementary schools are directly connected to the larger Jewish community, usually through affiliation with a synagogue, sometimes through a Jewish community centre, or other community organization. Research carried out by the Council for Initiatives on Jewish Education demonstrates that supplementary schools can be excellent when they receive strong support from their sponsoring organization and that organization's leadership.

We agree that all things being equal, more Jewish education is better than less. However, the reality is that significant numbers of Jewish families are unable to send their children to Jewish day schools or choose not to for a variety of reasons. These children deserve the best "supplementary" Jewish education possible.

A strong Jewish identity and a strong community stand on the pillars of family, synagogue, and both formal and informal Jewish education.

Two views on Ashkenazi pronunciation

I wish to disagree with columnist Bruce Elman's assertion (CJN, Dec. 24), that the use of Ashkenazi Hebrew pronunciation promotes Jewish disunity. Jews of European origin, who use this form of the language in study or prayer, are simply complying with the halachic requirement to follow the minhag (custom) of our ancestors. This requirement has the effect of preserving the many beautiful and ancient traditions that we have all inherited from our grandparents and great- grandparents.

In my opinion, Jewish unity does not mean that we must all adopt one homogenized set of practices at the expense of long-standing customs. It means that we can and should follow different paths, as long as we have a common goal.

Bruce Elman's column raises significant issues. I prefer to daven Ashkenazi myself; it is part of the heritage of Ashkenazi Jews, and you have to admit it has "taam." However, much of what is taught as "Ashkenazi" Hebrew today is something else altogether. It uses the accentuation and all or most of the vowel sounds of Israeli Hebrew, and retains from Ashkenazi tradition only the "s" in place of "t" (for a tav without a dagesh). As such, it is an attempt at a new hybrid standard different from the Israeli one, and this is indeed highly political. The popularity of this hybrid (used, for example, in the new ArtScroll siddur with transliteration) is a small, but disturbing symptom of how the anti-Zionist ideology of fairly marginal religious groups has penetrated into the Orthodox mainstream and beyond.

Perspectives

Canada, Israel and the UN

By BRIAN MORRIS

This month, Canada will begin its two- year term as a non-permanent member of the United Nations Security Council.

Canada's election to this prestigious position is a testament to the high regard in which our country is held by the international community. It is a reputation built upon decades of Canadian participation in peacekeeping missions around the world; in offering vital humanitarian assistance, most recently in Honduras and Nicaragua; and in providing leadership in such accords as the land-mines treaty and the treaty establishing the International Criminal Court. All Canadians can be justifiably proud of these achievements.

Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy has set a high goal for Canada on the Security Council, declaring that this country's "voice... will strengthen the UN's ability to respond to the myriad global security issues facing the world today."

Beyond this, its membership on the Security Council affords Canada the opportunity to further promote a long-standing goal of its foreign policy, namely fundamental structural reform of the United Nations system – to make the world body more efficient and professional by stemming its predilection toward excessive politicization. Nowhere is such fundamental reform more necessary than in the UN's treatment of Israel.

During much of the Cold War, the United Nations was used as a forum for superpower rivalries, wherein the Arab and other Third World blocs invariably lined up behind the Soviet Union. Typically, Israel became a victim of this bloc-vote behavior. With the Security Council neutralized by the United States veto, the focus of anti-Israel animus shifted to the General Assembly and to specialized agencies, such as the United Nations Human Rights Committee, UN Children's Fund (UNICEF), World Health Organization, UN Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the International Labor Organization (ILO).

These agencies and special UN conferences passed, annually, disproportionate and one-sided resolutions against the Jewish state. With the passage in November 1975 of General Assembly Resolution 3375 – the infamous "Zionism is racism" resolution – the United Nations reached its lowest point where Israel and general fairness and honor are concerned.

Following the collapse of the former Soviet Union in the late 1980s, and with it the end of the Cold War, and even more so, after the strong backing among Arab states for the UN-sanctioned multinational operation to evict Saddam Hussein from Kuwait in 1990-1991, an important change seemed to emerge in the UN's traditional hostility towards Israel.

The repeal in December 1991 of Resolution 3379 was one key indication of this change. However, this turned out to be a shift in appearance only. The "new world order" did not result in the promise of fairer treatment of Israel at the UN.

True, between 1992 and 1995 there were some noticeable efforts to "normalize" Israel's status in the UN and other international forums.

External Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy last year during his visit to Israel in the wake of the "Meshal affair." To Axworthy's right is Canada's Ambassador to Israel David Berger. To his left is Israel's Ambassador to Canada David Sultan.

The credentials of Israeli delegations were no longer routinely challenged; Israeli experts were elected to UN specialized commissions; and Israel began to be called upon to co-sponsor General Assembly resolutions and participate in UN committees. Still, Israel's status at the UN remained sui generis. Due to the continuing refusal of the Arab and Muslim countries to permit Israel to join the Asian regional group, Israel has been the only member state barred from being nominated for election to major UN committees, including the Security Council.

By late 1995, there was evidence of a return to a less hospitable, if not overtly hostile, atmosphere affecting Israel's treatment at the United Nations. Israel was subjected to unfair and one-sided criticism by the General Assembly and by the secretary-general for its military actions against Hezbollah in southern Lebanon in April 1996. (The criticisms completely ignored violent Hezbollah provocations, including the firing of Katyusha missiles at towns in northern Israel from positions dangerously close to Lebanese villages.)

Kofi Annan
UN Secretary General

Moreover, the General Assembly resumed its biased and unconstructive interventions in disputes affecting the bilateral negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. For example, the General Assembly complied with Palestinian demands to convene a series of unwarranted and discriminatory extraordinary "special emergency sessions" in reaction to the announcement by Israel of plans to build residential housing on Jewish-owned land in the Har Choma district of Jerusalem.

In addition, while rejecting growing pressure to have the status of the Palestinian observer delegation upgraded to a "near-state" level, the General Assembly, through its actions and statements, often accorded a non-state actor, the PLO, more privileged treatment than that accorded to a full member state, Israel.

The disproportionate attention devoted to Israel-related matters at the General Assembly and in UN functional agencies, both in absolute terms and relative to more immediate threats to international peace and security elsewhere in the world, epitomized all that remains terribly flawed in the United Nation's attitude toward Israel.

Unfortunately, Canada's efforts to use its influence to encourage a fairer treatment of Israel by international organizations, has been hampered in recent years by the inconsistent and incomplete application of this country's own Middle East policy. For example, Canada has long declared its strong opposition to "any move to suspend or expel Israel from the United Nations or its specialized agencies."

Yet, Canada voted in favor of a July 1997 General Assembly resolution that included a provision suggesting economic and political sanctions against Israel, the net effect of which would have been to leave Israel even more isolated than usual at the United Nations.

By consistently voting in favor of annual General Assembly resolutions declaring as illegal "all Israeli actions in occupied east Jerusalem and the rest of the occupied Palestinian territory, especially settlement activity," Canada is contradicting another core component of its Middle East policy: to "oppose all attempts to prejudge the outcome of [Arab-Israeli peace] negotiations by one-sided resolutions in international fora."

How can Canada help shape positive reform at the United Nations and simultaneously facilitate a more fair and even-handed treatment of Israel at the United Nations?

First, it can use its influence as a member of the Security Council to end Israel's isolation at the United Nations. Since the Arab and Muslim states refuse to admit Israel into the Asian regional group, Canada should join forces with other democratic nations to encourage Israel's entry into another suitable geographic group, such as the Western European and Others Group (WEOG).

Second, Canada can work to prevent passage of polemical, one-sided and counter-productive resolutions against Israel. To be sure, it is the responsibility of Canada and other Security Council members to comment and pass resolutions on issues of international import, including issues affecting Israel and the Middle East peace process.

But it is also incumbent upon them, to ensure that the treatment of Israel in such resolutions is proportionate and fair-minded, and designed to contribute to the pursuit of direct negotiations.

Too often, UN interventions in the Arab-Israeli peace process have failed to meet this basic test, often working at cross-purposes to ongoing diplomatic efforts brokered by the United States.

Third, Canada should encourage its fellow Security Council members to distinguish between real crises that are immediate threats to international peace and security, and non-crisis disputes such as those that have arisen in the context of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

After all, what is a more immediate threat to global peace: a political dispute between Israel and the Palestinians over the right to build on a barren piece of land on the outskirts of Jerusalem, or Saddam Hussein's (and Iran's) continued pursuit of weapons of mass destruction? (to say nothing of continuing discord in Kosovo, Myanmar, Rwanda, and the Indian subcontinent; humanitarian crises in Central America and sub-Saharan Africa; financial turmoil in the Far East and Russia; and the threat of international terrorism?)

The point is not that Canada and the Security Council should ignore issues affecting Israel and the Middle East peace process, but rather that they be dealt with in their proper perspective.

Early in its tenure on the UN Security Council, Canada might be expected to assess the legitimacy of a Palestinian move to declare statehood unilaterally in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, as well as a Palestinian demand for immediate admission to full United Nations membership.

The challenge for Canada will be to deal with these issues in a manner that is consistent with the core principle of Canada's policy towards the Middle East peace process.

This means that permanent settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute can only be achieved through direct bilateral negotiations between the parties themselves, rather than through provocative unilateral actions. A Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence (UDI) that occurs outside the Oslo peace process will cause violence, undermine the process of Arab-Israeli reconciliation, and harm global strategic interests in the Middle East and beyond.

Canada's ability to encourage its Security Council colleagues to oppose a Palestinian UDI on its own merits, and without being swayed by the anti-Israel bias that has traditionally pervaded the UN system, will be an important test of this country's diplomatic acumen as it enters the new millennium.

Brian Morris is national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Opinions

Verbal crossfire can be deadly

Even at the quietest of times, political debate and rhetoric in Israel are often nasty. Not surprisingly, the onset of a new national election campaign has already taken such discourse to more volatile levels – and the country doesn't even go the polls for another four months!

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

In such a highly politicized, divided nation, where little is laid back in the political sphere except the dress code in the Knesset, the verbal crossfire can be deadly. Literally. The murder of Yitzhak Rabin in 1995, after many had branded him a traitor and accused him of endangering Israel's security, made tough talk a particularly loaded issue.

Incitement is still very much in the news. Last week, Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon voiced alarm over the intensity of verbal abuse at the start of the election campaign. "If we carry on like this," said Tichon, "who knows what might happen in the future?"

Tichon was reacting to a recent spate of violent verbal threats against prime ministerial candidates Benjamin Netanyahu, Ehud Barak and Amnon Lipkin-Shahak. The candidates themselves didn't help matters much by uttering their own harsh denunciations of their rivals. Most controversial was Shahak's comment: "Netanyahu is a danger to Israel and is leading us to disaster!"

Those are fighting words, but such invective is not confined to the political arena. To be sure, the general level and tone of dialogue in this country are anything but dignified. Israelis have a great deal to learn about how to talk to one another. When they open their mouths, too often it's up front, loud, rapid-fire, in your face, combative, strident, with lots of histrionics. Nothing plays like an argument in Israel, and daily life here is full of it, especially where politics is concerned.

Recently, on the Erev Hadash TV program, Likud cabinet minister Yehoshua Matza and Labor MK Yossi Beilin were invited to discuss the press conference given that day by Shahak, in which he announced his candidacy for prime minister. Both strongly criticized Shahak for different reasons, before squaring off against each other over the respective records of the Netanyahu and Rabin/Peres governments. Tempers flared as Matza and Beilin, sitting next to each other in the studio, took off their gloves for a no-holds-barred verbal slugfest over whose party and leader constitute a greater danger for Israel's future. The host was hard-pressed to get a word in edgewise.

All year round, even when there is no election campaign, venom flows virtually every day in the media on the many current affairs programs in which politicians, pundits and assorted other guests confront each other over the latest headlines. Monday nights are especially rambunctious.

That's when each of the two main television channels devotes 90 minutes of prime time to lively roundtable political talk shows.

Last week, on Channel 1's Politica, also broadcast live on radio, host Yaacov Achimeir convened a distinguished panel of Knesset members and professors, in part to discuss where freedom of expression ends and incitement begins. There was little consensus, especially over Shahak's statement about Netanyahu.

At the same time on Channel 2's It's All Political, host Dan Margalit and his permanent panelists were joined by various Labor and Likud MKs to review the opening salvos in their parties' highly aggressive ad campaigns.

True to form, the initial sense of decorum quickly gave way to a cacophony of dispute, this time over which party was more guilty of hate-filled rhetoric.

Both programs remind me of a similar show on French television called Droit de Réponse that was highly popular when I lived in Paris in the 1980s. One time I was invited to take part in the program. As a guest, I was asked to be at the studio an hour before the broadcast. Within minutes of my arrival, the production staff made sure to offer all participants generously large glasses of wine or liquor. The objective was clear: to loosen tongues ahead of showtime. It worked liked a charm, helping make for an extremely heated, animated debate. It's a safe bet that no such drinks are needed for guests appearing on Politica or It's All Political.

Many people I know can't stand these programs because of the inevitable screaming and mud slinging. I may not savor the mean-spiritedness that pervades many of the discussions, but I do appreciate the engaged, informed discussions of the issues of the day affecting Israeli society. More troubling is that I often can relate almost equally to both sides of the argument.

Political deadlock continues

Israeli voters will go to the polls on May 17, about one year earlier than originally planned, but in terms of the big picture, not much is likely to change. The two basic pathologies that have plagued Israel for many years – the paralysis caused by the division of the country into two evenly split blocs, and the absence of qualified political leaders – will probably continue.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Since the early 1980s, national elections have ended in a virtual tie. In 1984 and 1988, the results were "too close to call," and this led to the national unity governments. In 1992, the Labor-left bloc, under the leadership of the late Yitzhak Rabin, won by a very small percentage and formed a government dependent on the cooperation of Shas (the Sephardi religious party). In 1996, Netanyahu defeated Shimon Peres by less than 40,000 votes in the first direct election for prime minister, and the Likud-based coalition had a shaky majority in the Knesset. The small parties with narrow agendas held the balance of power, and neither Rabin nor Netanyahu had a strong mandate to govern. As a result, decisions on critical national issues were bound to be contested by half the population.

In order to overcome these deep divisions, Israel needs leaders who will be able to bridge gaps and define a consensus on political and religious-secular issues. The first part of the election campaign has provided more evidence of the prolonged leadership crisis. Netanyahu's divisive governing style, more than his policies, has alienated many former supporters. As a result, his party is sharply divided, and Dan Meridor and Benny Begin have left to form their own parties. After polls showed that he had strong support, former defense minister Moshe Arens reluctantly decided to stand against his former protégé within the party.

However, Netanyahu maintains a loyal following and control of the party machinery, and is still the front runner.

In contrast to 1996, the chances that Netanyahu or any other candidate will win outright in the first round are very slight, and there will probably be a run-off, to be held two weeks later. If Netanyahu wins the Likud contest, his opponent will probably be Labor party leader Ehud Barak, or perhaps the leader of a new centrist party. But despite all of the talk and publicity hype, the effort to create a centrist party has gotten off to a slow and perhaps fatal start.

To be successful, this party must provide an alternative to the stand-off that has characterized the relationship between the two major political and social blocs. However, the two candidates who see themselves as potential leaders cannot even agree on who should head the party. Recently-retired IDF chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak led the polls before he declared his candidacy, despite his lackluster and passive role as chief of staff.

However, his standing fell dramatically after he launched a personal attack on Netanyahu (after calling for a more civilized political discourse), and he indicated support for major concessions in negotiations with the Palestinians and with Syria. Voters who view these negotiations warily, but who are disquieted by Netanyahu's personality and his more extremist allies, were already turned off by Shahak.

At the same time, Dan Meridor is seen as too "soft" for the demanding job of prime minister, and also has a record of hostility to religious groups. This is a major handicap, as a centrist party and candidate will have to draw votes from some of the religious community (modern Orthodox and traditional Sephardim are the most likely), as well as from the secular Ashkenazi middle class. (Another aspiring centrist candidate, former Tel Aviv mayor Roni Milo, is so anti-religious that he can be ruled out.)

As a result, the standing of Labor party leader Ehud Barak has increased. Like Shahak, Barak was the commander of the IDF (the fact that many of the major figures in the campaign are ex-generals is illustrative of the leadership crisis), and he made a number of mistakes in the transformation from military to civilian life. However, Barak seems to have learned from these mistakes, and has also distanced himself from the more enthusiastic supporters of the "peace process" in the Labor party, such as Shimon Peres and Yossi Beilin. (The fact that Uri Savir, another architect of the failed Oslo process, is supporting Shahak, will help Barak place himself as the true centrist candidate.) If Shahak is viewed as nothing more than an even more inexperienced version of Barak, the latter will emerge as the main challenger to Netanyahu.

With the elections still four months away, there are likely to be many ups and downs. However, the deadlock in Israeli politics will probably continue, and the winner will be able to claim only the narrowest of mandates.

Getting rid of old perceptions

By this time, anyone who knows about Israel and its neighbors, is aware that there is no love lost between Arabs and Israelis. Both sides contain extreme factions who believe that a solution to the problem can lie only in the total removal of the other side from the land in contention. These attitudes preclude, of course, any kind of real peace.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

There are also groups, particularly in Israel, who work to create a climate of friendship and mutual appreciation. These are very small, idealistic enterprises, but their organizers hope that out of such small efforts will eventually come large results.

On the Internet, I read a little while ago an article from the International Herald Tribune entitled, Building Business Bridges, sponsored by the New Israel Fund and by London's Marks & Spencer department store.

The following was reported: "Nine management trainees at Marks & Spencer are like any other aspiring business students: young, ambitious and eager to acquire the skills, experience and contacts that form the foundation of a successful career.

"But there is one key difference that sets them apart: The trainees are a mixed group of Jewish and Arab Israelis, and their presence here is an attempt to use a business to build bridges across ethnic and religious divides.

"For Avivit Peretz, a 26-year-old from Tel Aviv who works for a maker of computer-based teaching products, the three-month training program provided her first real interaction with Arab Israelis. 'I like the idea of Jews and Arabs learning together,' she said.

"For others, the program allowed them to build on their own experience of working in a mixed environment. Ihab Kashow, an Arab with accounting and business degrees, runs a small-business consultancy with a Jewish partner, and lectures at the Centre for Jewish-Arab Economic Development in Israel.

"The program, the first of its kind, is sponsored by the company, the Centre for Jewish-Arab Economic Development and the New Israel Fund, a Washington-based foundation that promotes economic development and Jewish-Arab equality.

"'Basically, the group here is nine individuals, not five Arabs and four Israelis,' Kashow said. 'That's the best thing we achieved here.'

"'We are all here together,' Peretz said. 'we're trying to bring that feeling back to Israel, and grow flowers from it.'

That won't be easy. The group admitted they were not exactly representatives of the broad spectrum of opinion in Israel. And while they appeared comfortable to return as ambassadors for peace and talked of establishing a charitable organization to sponsor Jewish and Arab interaction, they acknowledged they would face an uphill battle against historical mistrust and animosity.

Faith Khazin, a social worker from the Arab village of Rama, said she believed attitudes would change only with time. "We can't get rid of all the stereotypes, the prejudices we have internalized since we were born," she said. "The big thing will be to educate our children differently, without all of the diseases that we have."

The Kirshner File

Israel's talks with Syria became bogged down

Three years ago in March, following Syria's refusal to condemn a rash of devastating Palestinian suicide bombings in Israeli cities, Israel suspended peace negotiations with Syria. Today, the talks remain in a state of suspension, caught between Syria's demand that they be resumed at the point where they were interrupted, and Israel's position that they be restarted without preconditions.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Syrian view, set down by President Hafez al-Assad and chief negotiator Walid Mu'allim, holds that Israel, in August 1993, agreed to withdraw from the Golan Heights to the "lines of June 4, 1967."

Syria's interpretation is supported by, among others, President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt and Orly Azulay-Katz, an Israeli journalist who wrote a biography of Shimon Peres, The Man Who Could Not Win, in 1996. She claims that Rabin gave President Bill Clinton a promise that Israel would cede the Golan in its entirety to Syria in exchange for full peace.

According to this account, Rabin and Clinton agreed that this proposal would be passed to Syria as an American initiative. In the wake of his conversation with Rabin, Clinton instructed his associates to produce a "non-paper" summing up the matter.

Shortly after the publication of Azulay-Katz's book, the newly elected prime minister of Israel, Benjamin Netanyahu, was asked to comment on the matter. Netanyahu replied: "He (Rabin) spoke of a hypothetical possibility, provided that the Syrians meet a series of conditions which in fact – they had not."

Several months later, in January 1997, the Israeli press published a heretofore secret letter from Warren Christopher, the U.S. secretary of state, in which he stated that he did not regard the "non-paper" as legally binding.

The controversy lingers on, and now Itamar Rabinovich – a Tel Aviv University Middle East scholar, a former ambassador to the United States and Israel's chief negotiator at the 1992-96 bilateral negotiations – steps boldly into the morass with a sober, credible book, The Brink of Peace (Princeton University Press).

The Brink of Peace, which essentially concurs with Christopher's and Netanyahu's interpretation of events, not only dissects the complex, on-again, off-again talks, but provides a useful potted history of Israel's sporadic negotiations with Syria since the 1948 War of Independence.

As Rabinovich reminds us, Syria – which regards itself as the "beating heart" of Arab nationalism – has always been a tough adversary. Syria boycotted the 1949 Rhodes conference attended by all other Arab combatants, and when Israeli and Syrian negotiators finally met to thrash out their disputes, the sparks flew.

It is also worth noting that the Syrians waited five years until they grudgingly accepted United Nations Resolution 242, adopted by the Security Council in 1967. And when the time came to sign the June 1974 Golan disengagement pact, Syria authorized an Egyptian general to act on its behalf. Syria, too, railed against Egypt's rapprochement with Israel, partly because the Israeli government was unwilling to make more than cosmetic territorial concessions on the Golan.

Syria, therefore, placed itself beyond the pale of the peace process from 1975 until 1991. In that momentous year, when the Gulf War broke out and Syria committed troops to the anti-Iraqi coalition, Assad embraced Madrid. He did so because the Soviet Union, Syria's patron and arms supplier, was imploding, and there was thus an urgent need for Syria to improve its mercurial relationship with the United States. To that end, he decided to enter into direct talks with Israel.

As Rabinovich tells it, the first phase of Israel's negotiations with Syria was hardly fruitful. Neither Yossi Ben-Aharon nor Muwaffaq Allaf, the Israeli and Syrian negotiators, came to Washington to look for the middle ground. Syria insisted that there could be no progress unless Israel agreed in advance to a complete withdrawal. Israel, in accordance with Yitzhak Shamir's credo that Israel could not cede the Golan, offered Syria "peace-for-peace."

The two positions, of course, were irreconcilable. And the gap was compounded by a tense and unpleasant atmosphere among the negotiators and by mutual demonization.

A Rabin appointee, Rabinovich stepped into the minefield in July 1992, after the fifth futile round. He soon discovered that Rabin and Assad exerted an enormous influence on their respective countries' approach to the negotiations.

Wary of Syria, Rabin doubted whether its concept of peace and Israel's security interests on the Golan could be reconciled. But after being informed by U.S. Secretary of State James Baker that Syria was seriously interested in peace, he changed course. Nevertheless, Rabin proceeded slowly and cautiously.

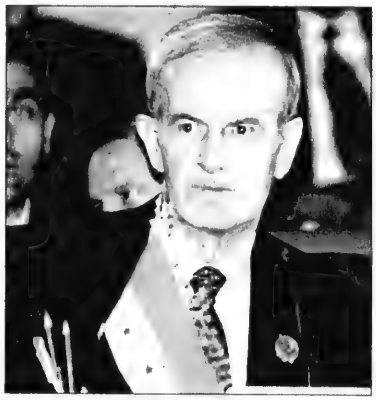
Assad, in the words of a Lebanese politician who knew him well, regarded any concession as "an unnecessary gift," and would not "let himself be constrained by limits or conditions set down by others." In addition, Assad was deliberate, mindful of the smallest details and suspicious of Israel's motives.

With Rabin's approval, Rabinovich made his debut at the talks by informing his Syrian counterparts that "peace for peace" was no longer Israel's strategy. The gambit was designed to impress upon the Syrians that Israel was prepared to seek a settlement based on "an element of withdrawal."

Eventually, Rabin formulated a policy from which he would not deviate: "The depth of a withdrawal will reflect the depth of peace." Syria's stance was "total withdrawal for total peace."

Israel proposed, and Syria rejected, ideas for a protracted withdrawal period and the leasing or exchanging of territories.

Syria, in turn, realized that no agreement was possible without a component of normalization. Yet, much to Rabin's disappointment, Assad refused to consider confidence building measures to enhance mutual trust. Nor was he ready to call off Hezbollah attacks against Israeli troops in southern Lebanon. He was, as Rabinovich notes, a great believer in combining "diplomacy with pressure."



Hafez al-Assad

Furthermore, Assad's conception of peace and security rankled Rabin. Viewing Israel as a rival, if not an enemy, he believed that an accord should not serve to enhance Israel's military and economic advantage over the Arabs.

Peres, Rabin's successor, wanted to conclude a swift agreement predicated on economic cooperation. Yet Assad was uneasy with Peres' boldness and creativity. More importantly, he rebuffed his overtures for a face-to-face meeting, and, bowing to Iran, continued using Hezbollah as a deadly surrogate in southern Lebanon.

In conclusion, Rabinovich claims that, in spite of golden opportunities which presented themselves in August 1993 and November-December 1995, Israel and Syria were never close to reaching a breakthrough.

Assad was not interested in an Israeli package deal for a limited first withdrawal linked to a comparatively long period of normalization. And his response to security arrangements indicated that an arduous bargaining process lay ahead. Rabin, meanwhile, was reluctant to countenance a full pullback.

Rabinovich believes that Assad really sought peace, but is still puzzled why he failed to take the crucial steps that could have brought about such an historic agreement.

It remains a conundrum.

No place like home

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

In the movie The Wizard of Oz, Dorothy, who has found herself in the frightening and bewildering land of Oz and desperately wants to return home, recites over and over again, "There is no place like home, there is no place like home," and she is transported home to Kansas. I don't know whether Frank Baum, the creator of The Wizard of Oz, was thinking of the Book of Exodus when he wrote his books, but "There's no place like home" is one of the great themes of the beginning of Exodus.

A couple of examples of this theme are: We are told that Jacob comes to Egypt, "himself and his home." The midwives who refuse to murder Jewish children are rewarded with houses. Moses' father, Amram, is described as a man from the house of Levi. Several of the plagues invaded Egyptian homes – the plagues of the frogs, the wild animals and the locusts.

Those servants of Pharaoh who fear God are spared the plague of hail if they brought their livestock into their homes, and in the plague of the first born, the Egyptians first-born were killed in their homes, and the Jewish homes were passed over.

The theme of home occurs in relation to the Passover sacrifice as well. The Jews are told that the Passover sacrifice is meant to be a lamb for eating in the home. The blood of this sacrifice is to be put on the doorposts and lintel of the home.

Why is the theme of home emphasized? Because having a home and freedom are connected. The one place every person has true liberty is in his home, his castle, where he and his family rule. Outside of the home there may be bosses, clients and others who stake a claim to our efforts. Inside the home is a place where there is no boss, no taskmaster, no ruler.

However, a slave cannot claim to have a true home. He is owned by another, and his home can be invaded whenever the master wants to claim his chattel, the slave. In this context, we can understand why the Torah emphasizes that the plagues entered the Egyptian homes.

The fact that the plagues made the Egyptians feel insecure in their own homes was meant to give them a taste of slavery, to experience what they were doing to the Jews.

That the Jews could turn to their home for security from the plague of the firstborn on the night of Passover indicated that they were rulers of their homes, tasting freedom for the first time. It is for this reason that much of the Passover ritual revolves around the home, because that is where the beginnings of freedom take place.

There are a lot of conclusions one can draw from this theme. It can be seen as a lesson in human rights, on how the right to privacy is a fundamental freedom. It can be understood as a lesson in family relations, on how a proper home environment is crucial for personal dignity. It can also teach us how religion begins at home, how we cannot leave God at the synagogue, because it is at home, our place of true freedom, that our personality truly shines. And probably, all of these conclusions are correct, for "there is no place like home."

Shabbat Shalom.

A special yishar koach

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, another yishar koach to the individuals who make the Jewish Highway a special place to visit.

You really have to hand it to Mark Burt to create a novel Web site, The Sefer Torah Recycling Network [http://www.i2.i-2000.com/~strnetmb/storah.html/]. In December 1994, the divorced accountant from Philadelphia was attending a singles' evening.

Instead of meeting his basherte, Mark found himself playing matchmaker.

He heard about the Israeli town of Bat Ayin, which needed its own Torah scroll. Five months later, the town had its own Torah, thanks to Mark's efforts and the generosity of an American yeshiva. Now through his Web site, Mark continues to play shadchan between towns which no longer have a use for their Torah scrolls, and communities in Israel looking for Torahs. Four Torahs have already been matched and four other matches are in the works.

There is no shortage of great Jewish cooking and recipe sites on the Web. But how can you ignore one called Marilyn, The Mishuganah Cook? [http://members.xoom.com/spartica/] More than just a place for food, you're invited to, "Come, sit down, take a glasele tey and come kibbitz, schmooz, rest, and grab a couple of recipes to go. Perhaps we'll even make a shidduch or two... nu, would that be so bad? Stranger things have been known to happen!"

It's a game played every day by Jews around the world, and now it has come to a keyboard near you. Thanks to Jewish geography [http://www.jewishgeography.org/], you may now be able to track down that long-lost friend or roommate. Registration is free, and there are already over 3,000 listings. Hey, now you'll finally be able to find Joseph-Ramiro Macias-Peretz in Monterrey, Mexico, or Lucy Tammam in Bournemouth, England.

Unlike some of the large and impressive sites like Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.virtualjerusalem.com/] or the Jewish Communication Network [http://www.jcn18.com/] or Shamash [http://www.shamash.org/], Jewish World Review [http://www.jewishworldreview.com] relies on much more modest resources. From his home in Brooklyn, Binyamin Jolkovsky has been publishing, editing and fighting for the survival of his lively news digest for the past two years. Regular contributors include historian Rabbi Beryl Wein (on the holiness of Eretz Yisrael), Jonathan Mark (Jewish comic book heroes) and Dr. Laura (Don't use other people's misfortunes to build your self-image).

Finally, I want to express my sorrow on the recent passing of Rabbi Yosef Kazen. The chassidic rabbi was a pioneer of the Jewish Internet and creator of the groundbreaking Chabad-Lubavitch in Cyberspace [http://www.chabad.org]. Even before the Internet, Rabbi Kazen explored the use of computer bulletin boards in his efforts at outreach. His passion grew to embrace other members of his family and thousands of fans around the world [http://www.chabad.org/yyk/zaleski.html]. He even used the Internet to help organize a Passover service on a boat near Antarctica.

Rabbi Kazen's work was profiled in the book and Web site, 24 Hours in Cyberspace [http://www.cyber24.com/], and in a feature titled Swords into Plowshares: Spreading Judaism at the Speed of Light [http://www.cyber24.com/htm2/4_45.htm].

At a time when some rabbis forbade the use of the Internet, Rabbi Kazen saw things differently: The Internet is a "fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy that swords will be turned into plowshares. The network was created as a Cold War military system; now it's for worldwide education."

May his memory and work be a blessing and a comfort to his family.

Why Americans pray

Powerful Prayers*, by Larry King (with Rabbi Irwin Katsof) (St. Martin's Press, $31.99).

Books
Bernard Baskin

Bill Moyers tells a story about his years as press secretary in the Lyndon Johnson administration. One afternoon he joined the president for lunch at the White House and was asked to say grace. As he began, Johnson interrupted and started yelling, "I can't hear you! Speak up!"

Bill Moyers looked at the president and said, "I wasn't talking to you."

To whom was Moyers talking? Does God hear prayers? Does He answer them? If so, how? Do generals pray before they go to war? Do world leaders pray before making crucial decisions? Can prayer change natural laws? Are prayers of psychological help?

These and similar difficult and complex questions are at the heart of this timely and inspirational book on how and why influential Americans pray.

In 1997, King was challenged by his daughter: "You are always having conversations with powerful people. Why not ask them about their prayers?"

King responded by calling on Rabbi Irwin Katsof, an old friend, to serve as his spiritual mentor and advisor. The rabbi is executive vice-president of the Jerusalem Fund of Aish HaTorah, described as an international educational organization dedicated to the preservation of Jewish religion and heritage.

The answers that King received make for a full array of approaches to the mystery, power and variety of prayer.

Allan Dershowitz, noted defence attorney and teacher at Harvard Law School replied, "I can't believe that God would want us constantly to treat him like a king. I also don't believe God will punish you if you question Him. I don't want to make analogies between myself and God, but my favorite students are the ones that question everything I say, all the time. So my God is a God who is prepared to engage in a dialogue and not just one-way praise."

Shimon Peres confessed, "Whenever I go to a Holocaust memorial, or when I go to the cemetery and see the young people lying there, I feel that all our prayers failed. So I know that not all prayers will be answered. Yet, in spite of this revolting feeling, I remain a great believer. I think our whole life would be extremely tough without believing and without praying. I know the Jewish people could never exist without prayers. What keeps us together is not our land and not our army for the last 2,000 years. What keeps us together is prayer."

Actor Kirk Douglas tells the story of a poor, childless, blind Jew who prayed daily at the Western Wall in Jerusalem. One day he heard the voice of God, "I will answer your prayer. What do you want most? I will give you only one thing." Finally, after much agonized thought, the man came to this conclusion: "Dear God, grant me just one thing, the joy of seeing my children eating off gold plates." This one prayer, if granted, would give him sight, children and wealth.

When Ed Koch, mayor of New York City, had his stroke he was visited in the hospital by a rabbi who helped him repeat a prayer in Hebrew. Later, he was visited by Cardinal O'Connor, who asked if Koch would like a prayer in the Hebrew language. Koch replied, "Your Eminence, I already took care of the Hebrew, so could you just do the Latin."

Several of the responses emphasize the need for prayer in order to be reminded from time to time of essential values and ideals. They say, in many ways, that prayer can keep these ideals vividly alive, because it is enriched by a thousand emotional chords, by well-loved words hallowed by the piety of one's ancestors, by the beauty of music more eloquent than speech,

Iraqi Jews remembered

Guest Voices

By RAMZI LOYA
Special to The CJN

Jan. 27, 1999 marks the 30th anniversary of the death of nine Iraqi Jews, who were falsely accused of spying for Israel.

In the early hours of Jan. 27, 1969, an Iraqi revolutionary court, specially formed for this purpose, announced its verdicts and condemned 15 people to death by hanging. Among them were the nine Jews.

The very short trials were staged, and there was no chance for the accused to defend themselves. The court appointed its own lawyer to defend them.

The victims were hanged in a Baghdad jail and their bodies were suspended in a public square.

That morning, the people of Iraq woke up to the sound of marches from Radio Baghdad, announcing that the spies had been executed and their bodies suspended in the Tahrir Square in the heart of the city.

There was live radio broadcast and television coverage all day from the square. The day was declared a holiday. The radio called workers and students to attend the "festival" at the square. Buses were provided free of charge. The people were rejoicing, chanting and clapping in a hysterical manner.

The crowd was estimated to be 200,000 and the celebrations continued until evening. President Ahmad al-Bakr, who approved the hangings, came to the square to enjoy the celebrations.

The government-controlled television showed 11 men suspended on scaffolds. Their faces were uncovered, and a large sign was tied to each body indicating the name and the words "spy" and/or "Jew."

One Jew was taken by plane to the city of Basra, where he was hanged on the same day. His body was suspended in the same manner in a square in that city, with similar jubilations.

Before the hanging, an official contacted Chief Rabbi Sasson Kadoorie, who used to make false statements that the Jews in Iraq were enjoying full freedom. Rabbi Kadoorie was asked to send somebody to the jail on the eve of Jan. 27, to recite prayers with the condemned Jews.

It was said that while standing in front of the gallows, the victims were crying, and insisted that they were innocent. It was also said that while the reader was reciting Shema Yisrael, some prison guards shouted at him, threatened him with their rifles and ordered him to say the prayers in Arabic instead of Hebrew.

The events in the square were videotaped and shown on Baghdad Television for several nights, instead of the late night movies.

While the people were rejoicing, Jews stayed inside their homes in fear, and most of them fasted the whole day. Some elderly men ventured out and went to the local synagogue in the evening to pray.

Two days after the hangings, the bodies of the eight victims were buried secretly in the Jewish cemetery under the eyes of the security police. Their families were not allowed to attend the burial.

Subsequently, a few more Jews were hanged on similar charges, but their bodies were not displayed. Others were tortured or murdered, either in jails or in their own homes.

After several years of terror, which began with the Six Day War, the government realized that these actions were no longer useful for propaganda purposes, since the whole world condemned them.

The government started to relax some of the rigid and discriminatory rules against the Jews, and in the end, it allowed them to leave the country.

It would be a great mitzvah if all synagogues observed this anniversary by holding memorial services, on the 8th of Shvat, for all the Iraqi Jewish victims and for those who died on this day, 30 years ago: Charles Horesh 44, David Dellal 20, David Ghali 23, Ezra Zilkha 51, Fouad Gabbay 30, Hiskail Saleh 21, Naim Helali 19, Sabah Dayan 30 and Yaakob Namurdi 38. May their blessed memories live forever.

Israel's electoral system differs from Canada's

Diplomatically Speaking
Jehudi Kinar

As it has been decided that new elections for the Knesset and for the position of prime minister shall take place on May 17 this year, I expect that many people will phone the consulate to obtain more information.

First of all, I have to make clear that the staff of our diplomatic missions abroad represent the government of Israel, but not the political parties.

Diplomats are not politicians and these roles should not be confused.

Israeli diplomats represent whatever government is formed in Israel and should not show any bias in favor or against any of the parties.

Only 11 positions abroad can be filled by political appointees. They are usually persons who have been members of the Knesset or government or have had very close links with the party or parties in government. These 11 positions are usually filled and in most cases with the change of government (if new parties govern or form a coalition) these political appointees are called back.

Unlike the United States or Canada, our heads of missions (ambassadors and consul generals) and most of our other emissaries are career diplomats and often have to adapt themselves to new guidelines after elections, especially if these elections bring new government or ministries.

Every Israeli citizen, 18 and over, is entitled to vote in elections for the Knesset, but individuals must be at least 21 years old in order to be a candidate for the 120-seat Knesset.

Few Israelis abroad retain the right to vote in Israeli elections. Only members of the merchant marine who happen to be out of the country, and emissaries sent abroad by government ministries or agencies such as, the Jewish Agency, the World Zionist Organization, Jewish National Fund and Keren Hayesod, have the right to vote.

Soldiers serving outside of their polling districts have the opportunity to vote with special ballots.

Special regulations govern how this vote abroad should take place. In the upcoming Israeli elections, this vote will be held on May 5 and if a second vote for the prime minister becomes necessary it will take place on May 25 abroad and on June 1 in Israel.

Since the last elections in 1996, the elections for the Knesset and for prime minister are held simultaneously. Both Knesset members and the prime minister are chosen for a four-year period.

On May 17, each voter will have two ballots: one for the selection of a political party and one for choosing the candidate for prime minister, who must be over 30 years of age.

The candidate who receives more than 50 percent of the valid vote shall be elected prime minister. If no candidate obtains more than 50 percent of the valid votes, then another election between the two candidates who received the most votes will take place two weeks later.

As citizens vote for a political party rather than individual politicians, the percentage of votes received by a particular party determines the number of seats allotted to that party in the Knesset.

The parties represented in the Knesset must obtain at least 1.5 percent of the national vote in order to receive a seat.

Some members of the Knesset have tried to increase that threshold to two or even three percent. The effect of such a higher threshold would be to decrease the number of parties, especially the smaller ones, in the Knesset.

According to many, this would be a way to make the work of the Knesset easier, although many others see this as limiting democracy.

For the time being, the number of candidates for the position of prime minister is increasing, but if you contact me or my colleagues to hear our opinions on the parties or candidates involved, don't be offended if we cannot answer you.

To offer our opinions would be against our conscience as well as a breach of our professional code of conduct as diplomats. Happily, this also stops us from making wrong assessments and predictions.

I hope that this article helps to clarify and illuminate some of the ways in which the Israeli electoral system differs from the Canadian one.

American prayers

by the warmth of fellowship with one's folk. This sense of fellowship means far more than a common membership in a congregation, or even comradeship with one's contemporaries. It means a feeling of identification with all the past generations, whose spirit lives in us.

This stimulating book is enriched by the lively comments of Rabbi Katsof, who grapples honestly with the issue of prayer in his own life.

Perhaps, the last word, quoted in the book, belongs to the mystic who believed that "God scattered holy sparks all over the world. Whenever a person prays with intent, his words attract one of these sparks and propel it heavenward to add brilliance and sparkle to God's glorious crown."

Yeshiva U school trains communal workers

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Esther Friedman, now a therapist and educator in private practice, went back to school in 1991 to study social work, she chose the block program of the Wurzweiler School of Social Work.

Friedman said Wurzweiler, which is part of Yeshiva University in New York City, had an excellent reputation for clinical practice, and the block program's unique work-study format afforded her the opportunity to continue working as manager of the art program at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care while pursuing her degree.

Wurzweiler's block program, which recently marked its 20th anniversary, divides the course load into blocks of study, separating the internship or student field work experience from the academic course work.

Students do 30-week placements in the city of their choice during the fall and winter semesters, and come to New York City during the eight-week summer semester to complete the academic requirements.

Adele Weiner, associate dean of Wurzweiler and the director of the block program, told The CJN the program was originally developed as an international program to provide training for Jewish communal workers in Canada, the United States and Israel.

It was also geared to non-traditional students, people who were already working in the field, Weiner explained. "We've had some very interesting students who would otherwise not have had the opportunity to go to school."

She indicated that at any given time, 15 to 20 Canadians are enrolled in Wurzweiler's block program, and most of them are based in Toronto.

She said two streams of study are offered: a two-year master's degree with 28 hours a week of field work, and a more intensive accelerated one-year master's program with 35 hours of field work for students with undergraduate degrees in social work.

About one-third of the students are in work study programs. Wurzweiler evaluates each person's place of employment to determine if it qualifies as an appropriate field placement, and sometimes an additional assignment is necessary, Weiner said.

Friedman, who had formal education as a teacher, said she increased her work responsibilities at Baycrest to enhance learning opportunities there, taking advantage of the organization's well-established and highly developed social work program.

As for the summer semesters in New York City, Friedman said the experience was very different from what she had expected.

"I went to study to get skills, and I ended up getting a lot more, because their methods helped me evolve as an individual and a professional.

"I was able to consolidate and build on my skills at Yeshiva. As a mature student, I was looking for a school where I could experience the learning process as someone with 40 years of life behind me. They valued what I had to offer at Wurzweiler and enriched that experience."

Friedman worked with clients – predominantly children and families – on a private basis for some 20 years prior to her 1993 graduation. For the last two years, she has been working full time in private practice, specializing in children with behavioral and learning difficulties and attention deficit disorders, and helping parents develop effective parenting skills.

Fay Geitzhals, supervisor of intake at Jewish Family and Child Services (JF&CS), who was in the first graduating class of the block program, said the program was an excellent learning opportunity, because "you were first part of the agency and then a student."

Her view is echoed by Yosi Derman, coordinator of evaluation and research at JF&CS.

Derman, who graduated from Wurzweiler in 1979, said when he decided to leave teaching and study social work in the mid-'70s, he chose the Wurzweiler School because the block program offered a more realistic work experience than the traditional social work student placements where students are just "parachuted" into an agency two or three days a week.

"You had a rich taste of what it was like to work at the agency and a richer integration into the agency culture," he said.

Karen Levenstein Longert, who graduated from the block program in 1991, said she found the summer group experience stimulating and unique, and she particularly enjoyed the diversity of the students.

At the time of her training, Longert was living in Sarnia and there was no master's program in the vicinity.

She said the Wurzweiler school offered her the chance to pursue her studies, and in her second year, she was even able to find a placement in a Jewish agency in Northern Michigan, just an hour's drive from her home.

Man sentenced for promoting hate against Muslims

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A man convicted of promoting hate against Muslims has been sentenced to perform 240 hours of community service on behalf of the Islamic community.

Mark Harding, 43, also received a three-month conditional sentence followed by a further 100 hours of community service during a two-year probationary period.

Chief Judge Sidney Linden of Ontario Court's Provincial Division said Harding's writings and a telephone message contained "false allegations about the adherents of Islam calculated to arouse fear and hatred of them in all non-Muslim people."

But he pointed out that Harding was a first-time offender and had expressed remorse since his conviction.

The Crown had asked for a jail sentence of between three to six months.

Harding's sentence was welcomed by Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region. Farber had testified for the prosecution as an expert witness on the effects of hate propaganda.

"We're not dealing with a person who is an avowed hatemonger in the same way as a white supremacist," Farber said. "He did it out of a misguided zeal and he's shown significant contrition. He didn't utilize the trial or sentencing [hearing] to promote his goals. He's certainly seeking ways to repent and make good."

Farber said the judge "balanced the seriousness of the offence with the need for general deterrence to demonstrate society's revulsion to hate propaganda. He pointed out that Jim Keegstra, the former Alberta school teacher who for years taught students to vilify Jews, was fined $5,000 on conviction.

Harding, who has a grade eight education and who has suffered a heart attack since he was charged, was convicted last June. Pamphlets he distributed has as their "prevailing theme...that Muslims, as a group, are dangerous people, capable of acts of violent terrorism and great cruelty," Linden found.

Linden also found that Harding "posits a world-wide Muslim conspiracy theory to the effect that all Muslims are united in the goal of overtaking the societies in which they live and subjecting those who do not embrace their ways to violent oppression. He warns that Canadian Muslims are no different but that they deceive us as to their true nature and intentions."

In his judgement, Linden rejected contentions that Harding could be immune from conviction because he was expressing an opinion on a religious subject. Farber called that element of the decision "very significant. Now we have a line in the sand drawn as to the use of religion as a cloak to try to excuse hate propaganda."

Meanwhile, on a Web site operated by the Canadian Friends of the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem, an open, undated letter purportedly from Harding compares the legal proceedings against him to "the malicious power of Satan.

"If I am convicted of a 'hate crime' because I told the Muslims the truth, that Muhammad was a false prophet and the Bible, not the Koran, is the word of God, then no Christian is safe in Canada," the letter states.

שישאר ביננו

דמוקטטורים

פרק ב: כתגובה, תוך יממה מופגזת אצבע הגליל במאות קטיושות, נגרם נזק לבתים ויש גם פצועים לא מעטים.

UJA Federation views Israeli bills 'with concern'

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is calling on the Knesset to refrain from dealing with two pieces of religious legislation.

Under one of the bills, Israel would only recognize religious conversions performed in the country, and approved by the Orthodox chief rabbinate. The bill, similar to legislation introduced last year, was prompted by a recent Jerusalem district court decision that, in effect, recognized several non-Orthodox conversions in Israel.

Conversions outside Israel are not affected by the proposed legislation.

In the wake of controversy surrounding last year's debate, a new institute was established, at which Orthodox, Conservative and Reform representatives prepare people for conversions, with the conversions themselves conducted under Orthodox auspices.

The second bill, which would require all members of Israel religious councils to express their loyalty to the chief rabbinate, was an attempt to counter an Israeli High Court ruling, which ordered religious councils to accept non-Orthodox members. Both bills have been rejected by the Knesset's law committee.

UJA Federation views the legislation "with concern," according to a statement issued by the organization.

"There can be little doubt about the divisiveness that would result, within Israel, between Israeli and the Diaspora and within the Diaspora, from passage of the proposed legislation," says the statement. "Given the long term detrimental impact of these measures on Jewish unity, it is inappropriate for them to be dealt with by the Knesset in a hurried and highly political atmosphere preceding the May 17 elections."

UJA Federation "recognizes Israel's centrality to our Jewish community and the Knesset's right to determine the laws governing Israeli society, bearing in mind the impact of such laws on Jews around the world."

UJA Federation has consistently opposed Israeli conversion legislation, while at the same time, it has set up a denominational committee representing all streams of Judaism to discuss such controversial issues and reinforce unity.

UJA Federation funds also support the Jewish Agency for Israel, which provides over $5 million in support for Reform, Conservative and Orthodox projects in Israel.

Jews drink less alcohol, Hebrew U study finds

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Jews don't drink, the old myth goes. And now there's scientific evidence to prove it.

New studies are bolstering the view that Jews don't drink as much as other Caucasians. Researchers attribute the difference largely to a genetic mutation that is found in a much higher proportion among Jews than among other whites.

Those surveyed possessed a particular genetic mutation that regulates an enzyme responsible for determining how the body breaks down alcohol.

A similar mutation is also found at relatively high rates among Asians.

The mutation makes people "more sensitive to alcohol. In other words, they get drunk very quickly," said Dr. Yehuda Neumark, a research physician at the School of Public Health and Community Medicine at the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Centre in Jerusalem.

Neumark, along with a team of researchers in Israel and the United States, recently completed a study that examined the DNA of a group of 145 Jewish men from Jerusalem, made up of both Sephardim and Ashkenazim between the ages of 25 and 64.

"In the Jewish Jerusalemites whom we studied, we found that those carrying this expression of the gene were very light drinkers," Neumark said.

The mutation was found in about one-third of the men in this study, yet it is only found among one to two percent of Caucasians in the general American population, said researcher, Dr. Lucy Carr.

Carr, an associate professor of medicine and pharmacology at the Indiana University School of Medicine, helped analyze the genetic material used in the Hadassah-Hebrew University study.

About two-thirds of the subjects were randomly selected, healthy men and one-third were heroin addicts recruited from drug treatment facilities in Jerusalem.

All of the healthy men were light drinkers, according to Neumark, while most of the heroin addicts had been heavy drinkers. His team found that the amount of alcohol consumed each week was closely related to the genetic mutation.

In a related studies, researchers are examining the impact of the mutation and cultural factors on Jews from the former Soviet Union (FSU) who are now living in Israel.

Genetic mutation found

Dr. Deborah Hasin, a professor of clinical public health at Columbia University, is preparing to study the various factors that impact the rate of alcohol consumption among Russian Jews in Israel.

Russia has one of the highest rates per capita of alcohol consumption in the world,while Israel has one of the lowest, Hasin said

Carr said she and her associates have studied a range of ethnic groups, which have included people from China, Japan, Korea, England, South Africa, and the Caribbean.

This year they expect to study 200 Jewish members of sororities and fraternities at Indiana University to find out how the genetic mutation makes them feel when they drink. Researchers will observe whether or not the students feel flushed quicker and if they develop headaches sooner than those people without the mutation.

Another recently released study, which was conducted at the University of California at San Diego, has found that about half of the Jewish students studied have the genetic mutation.

The students with the mutation drank half as often as the Jewish students who didn't have it – three times rather than six times a month for the male students; and a little more than twice a month, compared with just under five times a month for the women.

There was no difference in the amount of alcohol consumed each time between those with the mutation and those without it, said Dr. Tamara Wall. An assistant professor of psychiatry at the California campus, Wall headed the research team.

She and her associates are in the process of expanding the number of subjects from 65 Jewish college students to 100. They are also studying an equal number of white, gentile students for comparison.

One person who works with Jewish alcoholics and drug addicts, said that while there may well be a genetic basis for different rates of alcoholism among various ethnic groups, the findings should not make assisting Jews with alcohol problems a lower priority within the Jewish community.

"'Even if there is a lower incidence of alcohol addiction in the Jewish community, we cannot turn our backs on those who are affected," said Maxine Uttal, executive director of JACS: Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others, a 20-year-old recovery support organization based in New York City.

There are similar groups in about 28 Jewish communities around the country, she said.

Alcoholism among Jews "may not be as much of a problem as it is for other communities, but it's still a serious problem."

Shaliach wants closer ties between B.C. Jews, Israel

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Col. Ran Bagg (Ret.) wants to forge a closer partnership between the Jewish community in British Columbia and the State of Israel.

Bagg, who recently replaced Brig.-Gen. Itzchak Fuchs as the Jewish National Fund (JNF) shaliach to British Columbia, told The Canadian Jewish News that the JNF encourages Jews in the Diaspora to think of their relationship with the State of Israel as a partnership.

"Israel is a project for Jews all over the world," Bagg said. "Every Jew has a role to play."

Bagg said the message he is bringing to the Jewish communities in the Lower Mainland and the rest of British Columbia, is that the best way to "partner" with Israel is through the JNF. "No other Jewish communal organization focuses just on Israel," he said.

Bagg said there is a generation gap in the way Israel is perceived in the Diaspora. "The older generation remembers what it was like before the State of Israel was created," he explained. "The people between the ages of 25 and 50 have heard the stories of what it was like. But the younger people – less than 25 – were born too late. Israel has always been a part of their lives. The significance of the State of the Israel needs to be explained to them. That is what I'm going to do."

Bagg said he intends to go into Jewish schools in the Lower Mainland, and distribute educational materials and the JNF blue boxes. "The JNF needs to begin with the children, and give them positive ideas about Israel," he said. "The children will go home and tell their parents about Israel. In this way, the adults of the community will become more involved with Israel."

Bagg, 53, said his 23 years' experience in the IDF has given him an understanding of young people. "For all those years, I worked with young soldiers, 19, 20, 21 years of age," he explained.

Bagg said, that although he loved his career in the IDF, he hadn't planned to become a professional soldier. "I joined the IDF as a paratrooper in 1964, and I just kept signing up for more and more two-year terms," he explained.

Bagg fought in the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War. After the Yom Kippur War, he was promoted to head of the anti-terrorism branch of the paratroopers.

In 1976, he took part in the Entebbe Raid, which saved a planeload of Israelis taken hostage by Arab terrorists.

Following his retirement from the IDF in 1986, Bagg went to work in the Israeli high-tech industry. He also earned his private pilot's licence, and became so involved in civilian aviation that he was named manager of the Israeli Private Pilots Association, a position which he held until April 1998.

Early in 1998, Bagg was bitten by the travel bug. "I wanted to travel overseas, but I didn't want to do it in private industry," he explained. "I felt it was time to serve my country again." He knew the JNF was looking for overseas representatives, and sent in his application.

Bagg was interviewed, examined and finally offered the position of British Columbia shaliach. He arrived on the West Coast to take up his post in late October.

Bagg lives in Vancouver with his wife Sarah, who is a translator and interpreter. They have three children – a daughter and two sons – all of whom live in Israel. All of them served with the paratroops.

The swinging pendulum of spousal support

I have written about spousal support before, but I feel as if I'm shooting a moving target. The state of the law is constantly changing.

The pendulum has swung in the past ten years. Up to 1992, many Courts assessed the claimant's case by first questioning what steps she had or had not taken to become self-sufficient and then, only after such an assessment, addressing her needs and the payer's means. This method often led to reduced or "time-limited" spousal support orders, even in cases of lengthy marriages.

This type of judicial thinking originated largely in Western Canada, where feminist ideology has a much smaller following than in Ontario or Quebec. It falsely focused on the issue of self-sufficiency because of a misunderstanding of three cases that were decided in the Supreme Court of Canada. These cases together set out rules about when a spouse can successfully claim for more support after having signed a separation agreement that "fully and finally" released the other spouse from any further obligations beyond the support agreed upon.

Among other law created by these cases, the Supreme Court made comments indicating that spouses in such situations claiming more funds would have to show why they had not become self-sufficient. In the case of a spouse who became indigent, the Court concluded that "in the absence of a radical change in circumstances tied to a marriage related pattern of economic dependency, the obligation to support her should be, as in the case of any other citizen, the communal responsibility of the state". A recipient who couldn't tie her poverty to the marriage after signing such a release was also "out of luck" and had to rely on her own ability to earn money, i.e. become self-sufficient. If that was impossible (by reason of illness or other causes), the State would have to support her, not the former husband.

Many cases, especially in Western Canada, subsequently misinterpreted these pronouncements to apply to all cases involving claims for spousal support, not just those claims by women who had signed such releases. For a while, the Court decisions on spousal support became restrictive, reduced and time-limited, partly for this reason.

This ridiculous misreading of the Supreme Court decisions ended in December 1992 with the Supreme Court decision in Moge, which made it crystal-clear that using self-sufficiency as the primary criterion for determining spousal support eligibility was mistaken. It ruled that since the passage of amendments to the Divorce Act in 1985, the Court was to review several factors, including the means and needs of the spouses arising from the marriage.

Parents' relative contributions weighed

One of those factors was the contribution that one spouse or the other made towards raising the children and looking after the household.

In short, the Court adopted a "compensatory model" for spousal support that went beyond merely rewarding support because a woman needed the money. In a recent decision of the Ontario Court (General Division), the Court awarded spousal support because the wife had ostensibly devoted more of her life to parenting the children than had her husband. The husband earned about twice the income that the wife earned. It made such an award even though after paying child support, the wife's net income from all sources (including full-time employment income and child support) exceeded the husband's net income by about twenty percent!! In other words, it rewarded the wife with monies for raising the children even though both parties worked full-time, because the wife was, allegedly, more of a full-time parent. The Court also appears to have completely ignored the husband's substantial costs of looking after the children. (He has far greater access to them than most fathers in like circumstances.)

So now, the pendulum has swung way over to the other direction, as this case is not unique, at least in Central Canada. Whereas ten years ago the rallying cry of many Courts was "self-sufficiency", it is now "compensatory support", largely irrespective of the payer's needs and circumstances. Will the pendulum swing back again as men's groups across Canada cry foul? Ah, what interesting times we live in.

Conference on Orthodoxy set

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jews from the United States and Canada who see themselves as Orthodox and modern will examine dilemmas related to maintenance of traditional practices (including strict adherence to Halachah) and being fully participating members of society, at the first international conference of Edah, a New York-based organization founded to give voice to the ideology and values of modern Orthodoxy.

The conference, whose theme is Orthodoxy Encounters a Changing World, will be held over the American President's Weekend Feb. 14-15 at the Grand Hyatt Hotel in New York City. It is open to rabbis and laypersons.

Edah describes itself as committed to dealing with conflicts between Halachah and "ethical intuitions," fostering pluralism among Jews of all denominations, upholding democracy in Israel, finding "halachically appropriate" opportunities for women to participate in Jewish ritual, and searching for "transcendent meaning" in religious observance.

Norma Baumel Joseph of Montreal, a Concordia University Jewish studies professor and leader of the international movement to solve the agunah problem, is honorary conference co-chair with Morry Weiss of Cleveland, a supporter of major Orthodox institutions.

Joseph said the conference will provide for the first time a forum for like-minded Orthodox Jews to come together to "search for a consensus on, if not solutions to," their concerns. She hopes they will be able to lay to rest the idea that being Orthodox and modern at the same time is an oxymoron.

"People have said to me, 'You can't be an Orthodox Jew and a feminist,' but I exist," she said.

She does not foresee modern Orthodoxy splintering off as a distinct branch of Judaism, but she does see the need for "an organizational framework" for Jews who want to associate with others who believe Jewish law is flexible enough to allow them to live comfortably in today's world.

Her husband, Rabbi Howard Joseph, spiritual leader of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, will make a presentation at the conference on how 19th-century rabbis responded to modernity.

Edah director, Rabbi Saul Berman, said the organization was founded in 1996 to counter "the increasing tendency in the Orthodox community to withdraw from society to safeguard religious commitment." (The Hebrew word edah means community or group, usually in the sense of being one of the parts of a large society or nation.)

Edah's stated mission is to educate and empower Orthodox Jews to "sustain an open relationship with the general society while developing passionate religious lives."

Rabbi Berman said Edah "stresses open intellectual inquiry, engagement with the realities of the modern world, the religious significance of the State of Israel, and the unity of the Jewish people.

"We are convinced that Orthodox Jews can bring wisdom and values to bear on the ethical challenges which constantly emerge in the modern world."

Rabbi Berman was chair of the Judaic studies department of Yeshiva University, and is currently associate professor of Jewish studies at that university's Stern College for Women. He was active in the civil rights movement and the efforts on behalf of Soviet Jewry.

Among the topics on the conference agenda are: Secular Knowledge and Interaction with Other Cultures, A Community-based Approach to the Agunah Issue, Making Judaism and Democracy Comfortable Partners in Israel, and Feminism in Orthodoxy.

Speakers will include rabbinic and communal leaders and scholars from the United States, Canada and Israel.

The format is designed to minimize lecturing and emphasize small, interactive sessions.

University students will be invited to take part in a special forum on their role as future community leaders and issues particular to campuses.

The intention is to set up task forces at the conference to carry out its mission in concrete ways.

The chairman of the board of Edah is Michael Hammer, author of Reengineering the Corporation: A Manifesto for Business Revolution.

Edah has set up a leadership development program for modern Orthodox rabbis, mentored by Rabbi Berman and Rabbi Avi Weiss.

For more information about the conference, call toll-free 1-888-404-EDAH, or e-mail: [conf@edah.org].

Awright, listen up you guys, Kosher's Korner is on the air

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

LONDON, ONT. — Kishke, klezmer and kibbutz life – not to mention kibbitzing – are equally likely components of Kosher's Korner, a Jewish campus radio show conceived of and hosted by University of Western Ontario students Daniel Greenstein and Jonathan Mandel.

The weekly, hour-long show – the name is a take on Hockey Night in Canada's Coach's Corner – can be heard Fridays from 11 a.m. to noon on Western's campus station CHRW 94.7FM and on the Internet by following links from the radio's Web site, www.CHRW.fm.net.

Greenstein and Mandel are natives of Toronto and third cousins, who have been friends all their lives. Both 21 (Mandel is older by a month), they grew up within biking distance of each other's houses and attended Bialik Hebrew Day School. More recently they established C-Thru Window Cleaning, a summer business.

Last year, they submitted a proposal for a Jewish show to the campus station's program director after Greenstein, who is in his third year of administrative and commercial studies, noticed that the radio station schedule included many other ethnic shows.

Within two weeks, they were on the air, with no background in radio.

They have learned on the job and try to include "a little of everything," said Mandel, a third-year economics student. One staple is a news segment about Israel, often with a related discussion.

They "try to stay away from the political side," noted Greenstein.

"We keep the show pretty light, and project not just to a Jewish audience, but to whoever may be listening."

The show has evolved from last year when they did "slightly more wacky things like a mock interview with [fashion designer] Isaac Mizrahi."

They try to do one serious segment per show – either the news, an interview or an explanation of Jewish holidays or customs, said Mandel.

The show, however, is "pretty comedy-based" and cultural rather than religious, they said.

They find that long-forgotten lessons they learned at Bialik are coming back to them, Greenstein said.

Jewish food is a frequent topic of discussion, and the pair has been known to give out recipes or "banter about our bubbie's chicken soup," said Greenstein. "Now we do a lot more ad-libbing [than when the show began]."

Musical selections range from Leonard Cohen to Cafe Finjan to children's music. "We screen all the music, and only play stuff that's fast or catchy," said Mandel.

Arye Berk, director of Western's Jewish Students' Union, describes himself as Greenstein and Mandel's biggest fan. "It's amazing the research they do," he said.

The show, he said, is "a refreshing hour of hearing Yiddishkeit on the news."

It also serves the London Jewish community, he noted, by carrying community announcements. Through the Internet, the show has also reached listeners as far away as the United States, Israel and New Zealand.

CJC delegation to meet PM when he lands in Warsaw

But because the official delegation departs on Shabbat (Jan. 23), the CJC contingent will leave for Poland on a commercial flight two days earlier, spend Sabbath in Poland, and be waiting for Chrétien and the rest of the Canadian delegation when they land in Warsaw on Saturday evening. The group will then proceed to Auschwitz for the events the next day.

Ronen said he will be accompanied by two other Canadian invitees: CJC national director Jack Silverstone, and his father Mordechai, 66, a native of Hungary, who was a child survivor of Auschwitz.

Ronen's father, who came to Canada from Israel in 1966, and worked in the wholesale giftware business, was invited by the PMO to join the Canadian contingent when Ronen informed Sparkes about his history in Auschwitz.

triggered opposition from war veterans.

The federal government has since expressed a commitment to build a "stand-alone" Holocaust museum, and Ronen said Chrétien's visit to Poland will provide an ideal opportunity to convince the government to speed up the process.

"I think and hope the government will be determined to move quickly," Ronen said.

According to Ronen, a study filed last month, although not yet released officially, also supported the group.

The study was commissioned by the Museum of Civilization, which is run under the auspices of heritage minister Sheila Copps.

Barney Danson, a retired Liberal minister, is also serving as an adviser to the government on the proposed museum.

'Symbolism is quite dramatic'

"The symbolism of this is quite dramatic," Ronen said. "Here is my father, who rebuilt his life, returning with no one less than the prime minister of Canada."

Ronen and his father visited Auschwitz one time previously, in 1991, accompanied by then-incoming CJC president Irving Abella.

"For my father, it will serve as an invitation to declare victory over the Nazis."

Ronen said that Chrétien's visit to Poland, the first stop in a three-nation tour due to include the Ukraine and Germany, will likely also include some sort of official ceremony at Auschwitz, such as the recitation of Kaddish.

He said that the visit will also provide an opportunity to meet privately with Chrétien, and to discuss related areas of interest, such as the proposed National Holocaust Memorial Museum in Ottawa, war criminals, hate legislation, and amendments to the Canada Criminal Code.

CJC strongly supports a Holocaust Memorial Museum in the national capital, an idea that surfaced after plans two years ago for a Holocaust gallery in the revamped Canadian War Museum

Lallier's teaching load at Concordia reduced

But there have been some negative repercussions for the professor. His teaching load at Concordia was drastically and unexpectedly reduced last spring.

His suspicion that this change was related to his testimony was given weight by Southam News, which reported in October that it had obtained a copy of a letter, urging the department to let Lallier go. The letter had been signed by five economics professors last May.

"There is a possibility that all of the facts surrounding his (Lallier's) involvement have not yet surfaced," the letter read. "If there is more to this story than what is currently known, that could involve both the university and the department in damaging publicity. This is not a risk worth taking." (The instigator of this letter, incidentally, was not Jewish.)

Lallier was inducted into the Waffen SS in 1942 at the age of 17, and against his will, he said. This induction contravened an international convention that forbids drafting those under occupation and under age 18, he noted.

"It seems they thought I was one of the volkdeutsche (ethnic Germans) because my name ended in 'er'. In fact, we were French Protestants and I spoke no German."

He was assigned to a signal corps and served in a non-combative role in Yugoslavia until the end of 1944. He was later sent to what was then Czechoslovakia to train as an officer.

During the second week of April, 1945, he was among the guards overseeing the digging of an anti-tank ditch outside of Theresienstadt by some 8,000 inmates.

"Suddenly my commanding officer, a German, started shooting in the ditch, one person at a time until he had emptied his gun. It was all over in three or four minutes. At least five people were dead, maybe seven.

"I remember there was one giant of a man, with red hair and beard, who raised his arms threatening the Germans. It was an incredible act of courage," Lallier said.

He recalled seeing nothing that could have provoked the attack, and the officer was not berserk. No one apprehended him, and he apparently suffered no consequences, even though higher-ranking officers were present. "They did absolutely nothing."

The next day at their officers' school a memo was posted by their superior. "It said, to the effect, what happened, happened; it can't be undone. If we win the war, we will not be responsible. If we lose, we will all be dead anyway. We owe our fealty to Hitler and we are to keep our mouths shut."

After being released by the British in 1946, Lallier was assigned to a CIA agent. "When I gave him a report of what happened, his response was that the Soviets are all over the place; it's irrelevant and unimportant."

Lallier said he later worked for the International Refugee Organization under an American three-star general named Wood, who took a similar view of the incident.

While working as a resettlement clerk in Vienna, Lallier said he mainly processed the claims of Jews from Hungary and the former Czechoslovakia who wanted to go to Canada. "I falsified many of the records turning Jews who had been jewelers and merchants into textile and wood workers so they would meet the criteria of Canadian immigration."

Lallier said he has lived since with a "mixture of guilt and despair," in the first instance, for having not been able to intervene at the time and, over the years, to see justice done.

He officially retired from Concordia in 1986, and until last year had been an adjunct professor, teaching 15 to 18 credits a year.

Last spring, he was informed by his chair he would no longer teach economics. He was told the reduction was part of the new collective agreement, which was binding on all professors of his status. This year he is teaching just one 6-credit political science course.

Lallier attributes this change to the university's fear of having its public image tainted at a time when it is increasingly reliant on private fundraising.

"Once my story was in the media, some people lauded me, but I also made some sudden enemies," Lallier said. "Even my best friends asked me how I could be so stupid."

He and the university administration have since reached an agreement, which he calls "amicable" and allows him to retire "honorably."

It included a statement from Concordia provost and vice-rector (research) Jack Lightstone which was issued this month. Referring to the letter by the five professors, Lightstone said it "not only impugned Prof. Lallier's teaching credentials, but also suggested that he may have participated in the war crime that he publicly denounced in 1997."

PA considering declaring statehood on Dec. 31

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat is ready to negotiate with the United States on a postponement of a declaration of statehood on May 4.

The most likely replacement date for the announcement would be Dec. 31, the eve of the new millennium, before the start of the Palestinian leader's favorite tourism project, Bethlehem 2000, sources close to the Palestinian leader say.

Arafat's willingness to negotiate the postponement is based on the assumption that a declaration on the eve of an Israeli election would provide Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with an electoral boost.

Furthermore, a delay would give any newly elected Israeli government six months to fashion its policies on final status issues, or else the PA would unilaterally declare statehood at the end of 1999.

Sources close to Arafat say he wants U.S. agreement to a new date, believing this could isolate Israel on the issue.

But Arafat also knows that a postponement of the May 4 date could serve as a double-edged sword, with Netanyahu likely to tout such a move as proof of his tough position. It is still unknown whether Arafat would postpone the May 4 declaration if he doesn't win U.S. support for resetting the date to the end of 1999.

According to two sources close to Arafat, the timing is the key. One source said, "It would be symbolic to end this millennium and usher in a new one with a declaration of a Palestinian state, and it would be consistent with Arafat's promise for such a state to occur in 1999."

Arafat, who personally chairs the Bethlehem 2000 project, is hoping that many dignitaries from all over the world will come to Bethlehem for the new millennium, and hence the timing would be appropriate.

Part of the significance of a Dec. 31 declaration is that Jan. 1 is the official anniversary date of the founding of Fatah, Arafat's political party.

A third source, a senior U.S. official said, "Both Arafat and we want to get by May 4 and May 17. We think he understands the need to delay."

In return for a postponement of independence, Arafat will try to win benefits from Israel and the United States, but some sources say he is not too hopeful. His preference would be to win a guarantee on the second and third West Bank pullbacks, and an assurance from Washington on some new upgraded diplomatic formulation such as U.S. endorsement of Palestinian self-determination.

However, these sources say Arafat is becoming more dubious about this happening during a fiercely partisan election campaign in Israel. In any event, the Palestinians would like an unambiguous statement from the United States that goes further than the one recently made by State Department spokesperson James Rubin on Palestinian compliance and Israeli non-compliance with the Wye agreement.

Meanwhile, Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat announced last weekend that at Ross' request, he will meet with his Israeli and U.S. counterparts in Washington next month to discuss outstanding interim issues. Israel will be represented on that steering committee by Tomer Omri, a personal aide to Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon.

IDF readies for ABM warfare

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai last week attended the unveiling of a unique simulator of a command and control centre for anti-ballistic missiles, and on the same day, Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz told reporters that "in the next war, missiles will hit the home front, so it's important to strengthen the standing army, because it will take time to call up reserves."

Mordechai said Israel cannot depend on the Arrow ABM as the only protection from missiles, but must develop an offensive capability against enemy missile launchers.

Speaking at a professional conference that accompanied the unveiling of the Strategic Defence Project at Tadiran Systems, where a war-room simulator of a missile versus missile war has been built, Mordechai said the establishment of a strategic command is aimed at making it possible for the defence establishment to prepare an adequate response to the long-term threats of the next five to 10 years.

Mordechai called some of those threats "existential," adding that the defence establishment is operating on three levels to meet the challenge: updating the defence concept, adapting the IDF's structure to reality and changing needs, and preparing a multi-year plan to modernize the weapons systems and develop strategic projects.

The Arrow has already gone into production, with project managers saying that by 2000, the system will be partly operational. But the discussion that followed Mordechai's visit to the simulator, which demonstrated what happens when Arrows and Patriot missiles work together against incoming missiles, emphasized that the Arrow was not sufficient as a defensive wall against incoming missiles, nor as a deterrent by itself.

One leading expert pointed out that missiles like the Arrow, which shoot down incoming missiles on the fly, are far more expensive than ground-to-ground missiles, which are far less accurate, but by hitting civilian areas, can cause far more damage to the enemy.

At Mofaz's press conference to unveil some of the details of a plan he said was "a profound change" for the army, the chief of staff said some 2,000 management jobs at army headquarters would be cut, with the savings passed over to combat units.

Among other things, the army will be cutting back on senior officers and adding money to the standing army. It may eliminate the southern command – with its daily security concerns around Gaza to be taken up by the central command – and begin removing from the system outdated weaponry, to be updated with modern weapons systems.

Mofaz said the massive cuts in jobs at headquarters will be mostly soldiers and officers up to the rank of major, and that at least eight brigadiers (out of 120) and 20 colonels (out of 500) would be fired.

Israel weighing Bronfman burial request

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A high-powered committee that includes a former president and a former president of the Supreme Court, has been established to decide whether World Jewish Congress President Edgar Bronfman should be allowed to have his final resting place on Mount Herzl, in the section reserved for the "nation's great leaders."

Bronfman's request – the first of its kind by someone who is not an Israeli citizen, and has chosen to live in the Diaspora – was made through unofficial channels to the chair of the Jewish Agency executive, Avraham Burg.

Burg convened the executive of the World Zionist Organization (WZO) to discuss the question, and that body decided to appoint a three-member committee consisting of former president Ephraim Katzir, former Supreme Court president Meir Shamgar, and a member of the WZO executive to deliberate the matter.

Bronfman is known for his work on behalf of various subjects related to the Jewish people and Israel.

Mount Herzl occupies a major place in the pantheon of Israel's national symbols. The first to be interred there, in 1949, were soldiers who fell in the 1948 war, most of whom were killed in the battle for the nearby Sheikh Badr area.

It was also in 1949 that the remains of the founder of political Zionism, Theodor Herzl, were buried atop the hill, after a procession that followed the route Herzl had taken when he visited Palestine in 1898.

The military section of the cemetery is on the northern slopes of the mount – row upon row of uniform modest white slabs, beneath pine and cedar trees.

Herzl's parents are buried near their son's tomb, which sits alone on the hilltop. His sister is also interred there, and nearby lie three presidents of the WZO and two chairs of the Zionist executive.

Not far away, in the section reserved for the "nation's great leaders," are the plots of Israel's presidents, prime ministers and Knesset speakers including Levy Eshkol, Golda Meir, Zalman Shazar and most recently, Yitzhak Rabin.

The remains of Ze'ev Jabotinsky, the founder of the Revisionist movement, forerunner of today's Likud, are interred in a separate section nearby. The section also contains the graves of Jabotinsky's wife, Johanna, and his son, Eri, who was a Knesset member.

Now, world Jewry wants its share of the symbolic soil. Above all, Edgar Bronfman's request has produced embarrassment in the two bodies that are responsible for authorizing plots on Mount Herzl: the WZO and the Ministerial Committee for Symbols and Ceremonies.

No one disputes Bronfman's contribution to Israel. No one denies his part in breaking down the Iron Curtain that shut in the Jews of the Soviet Union, his denunciation of former UN secretary general Kurt Waldheim as a member of the Nazi party in World War II, or his involvement in many of the most sensitive projects of the Israeli government.

But Bronfman is not an Israeli citizen, and underlying his request, which he unsuccessfully tried to keep secret, is the question of whether Israel – and more specifically its national cemetery, is the state of all its residents (though primarily its Jews) or also the state of all the world's Jews as well.

The implications are far-reaching: is there a Jewish nation or an Israeli nation? Who deserves the epithet "great"? Bronfman's request sets a precedent. No similar request was ever made before, and therefore no such request was rejected either. Nor are there clear criteria for internment in the "greats" section. Not all of those who were eligible for interment on Mount Herzl took advantage of the opportunity.

Berlin memorial under fire

By DEIDRE BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

FRANKFURT — The Berlin chapter of Germany's leading conservative party has added its voice to the chorus of critics of the design for the country's proposed national Holocaust memorial.

A plan by the Christian Democratic Party's chapter rejects the design by American architect Peter Eisenman – a stone memorial the size of several football fields – and calls for the competition to be reopened for a third time.

The plan also calls for the memorial to be placed on a new, smaller site that its supporters call more central – between the future Parliament building and the chancellor's office, instead of a site near the Brandenburg Gate currently reserved for the monument.

Disagreements between the private and public sponsors about the design and the site of the monument, which was first proposed a decade ago, have not only prevented construction but have jeopardized the entire project.

The city of Berlin, the federal government and a private foundation that launched the project must agree on a design before the monument can be built.

Berlin Mayor Richard Diepgen is pushing for the monument to be built on the site of a newly built Jewish museum, which will be opened this year, or on the grounds of a museum about the Gestapo, which is under construction.

Germany's Parliament is expected to discuss the project this summer.

The Week in Israel

Jan. 11

• During a visit to Israel, Japan's foreign minister, Masahiko Komura, called on Israel to adhere to the Wye Accord, and on the PA to delay a unilateral declaration of statehood. Komura offered Tokyo's assistance in restarting peace talks with Syria.

Jan. 12

Jan. 13

• A Knesset committee rejected a bill that tried to block the appointment of non-Orthodox representatives to local religious councils. The move prevented the bill from returning to the full Knesset which had already approved it at first reading.

• A border policeman, Yehoshua Gavriel, 25, was killed near Hebron when Palestinian gunmen opened fire on an undercover police unit. The border policemen prevented an attack on Israeli civilians.

Jan. 14

• Israeli jets attacked several Hezbollah positions in southern Lebanon after Hezbollah gunmen fired mortars at Israeli positions in the region.

• Israel's two chief rabbis held an unprecedented meeting with the spiritual leaders of the Agudat Yisrael to discuss recent pluralism developments. Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau acknowledged that the rabbinic groups had never met before.

Jan. 15

• The highest rabbinic authorities of Agudat Yisrael and Degel Hatorah issued a joint religious ruling declaring invalid any decision from the Supreme Court that is opposed to Halachah. Until now, attacks by the haredi community against the Supreme Court had come from political functionaries. This was the first criticism of the High Court by the Haredim in religious or halachic terms.

First Jewish woman named Swiss president

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERN — Switzerland now has a president who plans to speak out aggressively about her country's role during World War II.

Elected in December by the Swiss Parliament, Ruth Dreifuss assumed the country's presidency on Jan. 1. She said she is "especially proud as a woman and also of course as a member of the Jewish community" to take on the post.

Dreifuss, 58, a member of the left-of-centre Social Democrats, has replaced Flavio Cotti in the largely ceremonial post, which rotates on an annual basis among the Swiss Cabinet's seven members.

She has served as interior minister, a portfolio she still retains as president.

Dreifuss is the first Jew and the first woman to become president of Switzerland.

The country is now attempting to cope with an anti-Semitic backlash after a recent international campaign by Jewish groups pressured Switzerland to acknowledge the financial ties that existed between its banks and Nazi Germany.

The Jewish organizations have accused the banks of laundering Nazi-looted gold, and also refusing to make restitution to Holocaust survivors for unpaid dormant accounts dating back to the war. These allegations stung Swiss sensibilities and continue to spark anti-Semitic incidents.

Ruth Dreifuss

In an interview last month with Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), Dreifuss made it clear that she would not back off from the controversy.

"My professional commitment is leftist, feminist and dedicated to human rights," said Dreifuss. But, she added, the issue of the country's wartime actions would also be on her political agenda.

She noted that she kept a low profile on the issue in the past because she did not want to speak out as the "token Jew" in the government.

"But I am, and was always, proud of my Jewish roots," she said, adding that she will reopen dialogue with Jewish groups over Holocaust-era issues.

"Because of my roots, I am more sensitive than others in the government to the whole problem."

Dreifuss, a non-practicing Jew was born in 1940 in an eastern Swiss canton, or state. As the Nazis approached the Swiss border, her family moved to Geneva, at the western edge of the country.

During the war, her father, Sidney, played a role in helping Jewish refugees who sought haven in Switzerland.

Dreifuss said that her father's actions played a role in shaping her determination to seek justice for Holocaust victims.

Sources in the Swiss government said Dreifuss has always maintained an excellent private relationship with the World Jewish Congress (WJC), the group that initiated the charges against the Swiss banks.

Her religion has never been an issue, even during those times when the government was reporting an increase in the anti-Semitic backlash to the WJC's and other groups' allegations.

Despite this, Swiss Jewish groups preferred to keep a low profile in their reaction to her being named to the presidency.

"Every Swiss Jew is proud" that she was elected, a senior member of the Swiss Jewish community told JTA on condition of anonymity.

Neither the Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland, the community's umbrella group, nor any other Swiss Jewish organization published a letter of congratulations to Dreifuss, fearing that such a move could provoke counter-statements from anti-Semites in the country.

Dreifuss raised some eyebrows when she was among the few Swiss politicians to welcome the decision in August by two leading Swiss banks to pay a $1.25 billion settlement of Holocaust-era claims.

Despite that settlement, she now insists that the country must continue to deal honestly with its past.

STRUB'S Pickle Corner STRUB'S

Vol. 1, No. 9 • January 21, 1999

Hello! How are ya'? What's cooking? The view from Canada on the Clinton impeachment is very disconcerting. Thank goodness, most of us are more concerned with the snack menu at the Super Bowl party. Just remember that no matter which program you decide to watch on TV, make sure you have your favourite bottle of Strub's pickles handy to make your entertainment tastier.

Letter of the Month

Dear Pickle Guy,

As one who grew up in Toronto and was nurtured and nourished on Strub's pickles, you can only imagine my delight when I moved to Cleveland and discovered that these pickled delectables would once again be available to me. No American kosher pickle comes close to this CANADIAN CLASSIC. Many thanks for making your delicious dills and other items available on this side of the border.

B'Shalom!

Four generations illustrate women's changing roles

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

So sure is director Jordan Merkur that his latest play will appeal to four generations of women, that any daughter bringing her mother, grandmother or great-grandmother will get two tickets for one admission on Tuesday evenings.

My Mother Said I Never Should, an Eclectic Theatre production, is at the Alumnae Theatre, 70 Berkeley Street, until January 31. Tickets are $16 to $22, Tuesday to Saturday at 8 p.m. Sunday performances at 3 p.m. are pay what you can. (366-7723).

It is the Canadian premiere of a play written by British playwright Charlotte Keatley in 1987. It has had performances at two prestigious theatres in England.

Dealing with the changing role of women this century, the play skillfully draws together the experiences of four generations of women.

In fact, as the lead, well known actor and Shaw Festival star, Jennifer Phipps, plays a 5-year-old at the beginning, an 82-year-old who has a critical change in her lifestyle, and is the 87-year-old great-grandmother at the end.

Jordan Merkur

Merkur, a 36-year-old theatre veteran, is sure there are still lots of great-grandmothers living in Toronto. "I had one when I was growing up and she was a vibrant force in the family."

My Mother Said I Never Should is not just about mother-daughter relationships, but about the guilt, misconceptions and anxiety that surround relationships among four generations, Merkur said.

He has plunged into directing this four women cast with great enthusiasm, as a break after three outstanding musicals, Passion, Assassins and Chutzpah A Go Go. Assassins won him a Dora Award for best production of a musical in 1994.

My Mother Said I Never Should is the 18th production of Eclectic Theatre of which Merkur is the artistic director.

Born in North York, Merkur attended United Synagogue Day Schools and Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and garnered a four-year Fine Arts degree at York University. His theatre training also included Circle in the Square Theatre, New York, and the Banff School of Fine Arts.

Man Alive discusses story of Job

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Why do bad things happen to good people? One of the oldest accounts of this universal dilemma is dealt with in the Book of Job, one of the most fascinating books in the Bible.

R.H. Thomson hosts a two-part program examining the Book of Job on CBC television's Man Alive. A three-person panel discusses and analyzes this book and the way it probes the phenomenon of suffering.

The Book of Job tells in poetic form the story of a righteous man, who feared God and shunned evil, yet had very horrible things happen to him. Plague-ridden, his children dead and his fortune gone, Job curses his very existence and dares to ask God why these things have happened to him.

The second part of this discussion, airing on Jan. 24 at 12 p.m (Part One aired Jan. 17) focuses on God's reply to Job's questions. The three panelists, Schuyler Brown, professor of theology at U of T; Ray Scheindlin, a professor of theology at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York; and Rachel Turkienicz, director of Judaic studies at the Toronto Heschel School.

The panelists have different takes on the book. However, when Job asks God, "Why me?" all panelists agree that God skirts the issue and redefines the question in His own way.

By leading Job through the history of the universe's creation, God seems to be saying that the answer to Job's question is universal and can't be answered personally. Job is only a small cog in the wheel and as an individual is perhaps no more important that the lowest of life-forms inhabiting the earth.

"God doesn't give an answer that the reader finds just," according to Scheindlin. Basically, he says, God tells the reader, "Man shouldn't expect to know how the universe works any more that the animals."

Brown says the undertone of the narrative is even more sombre. He believes the book removes any hope in an afterlife. "If there is no justice here [on earth] there is no justice anywhere."

In the end, of course, God accepts that Job's complaints against Him were justified and his fortune is restored and he has more children. But even this, the panelists say, may not be all that just. After all, Job still must suffer the loss of his first children who will never be brought back.

Ultimately, this book is not meant to console the sufferers amongst us. Mankind, the panelists believe, is never to understand the wisdom that governs the universe.

If you like good theological discussions this program will certainly interest you. Be warned, though, like the Book of Job, there are few concrete answers offered by the panelists.

Ashkenaz impresario key man in Yiddish revival

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's early on a cold December morning. Dormant computer screens stare blankly into darkness, as lonely telephones lie idle in the stillness of an empty office.

Empty, that is, but for David Buchbinder. He is the first to arrive here at the King Street headquarters of the Ashkenaz organization, and somehow you get the sense he'll be the last to leave.

For over a decade now, this Toronto musician, bandleader, composer, and impresario has been one of the premier figures in the Yiddish revival, that unlikely phenomenon which has breathed new life into the once-terminal music and culture of eastern European Jews.

As the founder, leader, and trumpet player of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, Buchbinder has developed a unique modern sound based on the klezmer tradition. The Flying Bulgars have emerged as Canada's foremost representative on the international klezmer music scene, and have played a significant role in convincing a younger generation that Jewish music is exciting and very much alive.

Perhaps more importantly, as the visionary behind the biannual Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture, Buchbinder has brought home to Toronto the revival in all its diverse manifestations.

He has watched what began as a half-serious dream grow into an internationally acclaimed showcase, the largest festival of its kind in the world. This summer's third Ashkenaz Festival (Aug. 30 to Sept. 6) will be the largest yet, with 175 artists and an expected turnout of more than 100,000 people sampling a myriad of offerings in Yiddish music, art, film, dance, theatre, poetry and literature.

Sitting in his cluttered office, surrounded by heaps of demo tapes, CDs, videos, and promotional packages sent in by hopeful applicants to the 1999 Ashkenaz Festival, Buchbinder reflects on the importance of Ashkenaz in catalyzing interest in Yiddish culture.

"There's no better tool than the festival for getting people to say 'wow, this is something.' We have such a wide range of things going on so there's something for everybody. And a big part of what that does is it shows people the continuum. It shows them how the new culture is linked to the old, and how there's much more to it than the Fiddler-On-the-Roof stereotype."

Even more significant says Buchbinder is the manner in which the festival unites Toronto's Jews (and non-Jews) in joyous celebration.

"The basis of a lot of music and art is about people coming together and sharing powerful experiences. To me it's about magic. When people come to Ashkenaz they can't help but be drawn into this huge vortex."

But for Buchbinder, once every two years is too rare a chance to taste the "magic" of group enrapturement that the Festival generates. Over the past few years the Ashkenaz organization has expanded its activities to include year-round community events.

"We started doing these community events in order to maintain continuity," he explains. "The first festival was such an eye-opening experience of community involvement and collective synergy that we began asking ourselves how we could get people to participate in an ongoing way in a kind of celebratory culture grounded in Yiddishkeit."

Answers to this self-imposed challenge have come with increasing frequency. Ashkenaz-sponsored Purim, Chanukah, and dance parties, and summer klezmer concerts at Earl Bales Park have now become fixtures in Toronto's growing Yiddish cultural scene.

Ashkenaz has also run day-long workshops on various aspects of Yiddish culture, sponsored Yiddish-themed artistic installations, and helped stage productions in Toronto by travelling Yiddish theatre troupes and by renowned klezmer groups like Finjan and the Epstein Brothers.

Combining a community spirit with a love for Yiddish culture and an emphasis on interactive participation, these events have cultivated an ever-growing grass-roots following among young and old alike.

David Buchbinder (front) leads Toronto's Yiddish revival.

But forging links between the Jewish community and an active Yiddish culture is not always easy. Limited resources, both human and financial, hamper efforts to publicize Ashkenaz events and get more people involved, according to Buchbinder.

"I think if we were in a completely stable funded environment it would be easier to plan for more of these [events].

"And if there were more of them it would be easier to build on that, to generate continuous momentum and a strong ongoing presence in the community. We're doing lots of worthwhile things, and though we are getting support, people have to realize that sometimes it's a hard sell, culture in the Jewish community."

Nevertheless, Buchbinder sees a bright future ahead for Ashkenaz and contemporary Yiddish culture. "All I have to do is look at the difference in what was around when I started playing this music in 1987, which wasn't that long ago, and what's around now. It seems to have more momentum now than ever, and it keeps growing."

In the meantime, he has his own artistic ventures to pursue. His Flying Bulgars have recently returned from a successful tour of Sweden and have been signed to an American record label. They will record their fourth CD in March.

Buchbinder concedes that it's sometimes hard to balance his varied enterprises. But he appears to have a clear vision, and exuding a humble confidence and seemingly boundless enthusiasm, he seems to be up to the task.

He says he has no doubt that Yiddish culture and klezmer music have only just begun to flourish.

"In a way we're just in the prelude. There's now an entire generation that's grown up surrounded by this culture, who see Yiddish music as normal and inspiring."

It's now nearing noon; the office has come alive. Employees and volunteers have drifted in and phones begin to ring with increasing frequency. Another day in the life of Ashkenaz has begun, and with it more roots are laid for the future of Yiddish culture in Toronto.

To inquire about upcoming Ashkenaz events, call (416) 703-6892 or check out their website at: www.ashkenaz.org

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

CONSERVATORY PAYS TRIBUTE TO BERLIN

The Royal Conservatory of Music recently paid tribute to Boris Berlin, one of Canada's outstanding piano teachers, composers and authors, who has been a cornerstone of the conservatory since 1928.

Recently, Berlin celebrated two landmark occasions: his 70 years as a teacher and mentor at this prestigious musical institution, and his 70 years of marriage to his wife Tosia. Eye on Arts extends congratulations to both Berlins.

The Season of Kaddish: Leon Wieseltier's recent book Kaddish (Knopf) is a journal of the year in which he said the prayer known as the Mourner's Kaddish three times daily for his deceased father.

The book has been reviewed in many quarters, including The Canadian Jewish News and the Globe and Mail, where no less a literary luminescence than Robert Fulford devoted a column to it, finding it intellectually stimulating though lacking in scholarly method.

In a period when many young and middle-aged Jews are rediscovering their own once-neglected religion, the nonfiction literary realm is offering another book on ancient Jewish mourning customs.

Saying Kaddish: How to Comfort the Dying, Bury the Dead & Mourn As A Jew, by Anita Diamant, is an insightful guide into how to derive meaningful comfort and solace from the old traditions. Far less reflective and philosophical than Wieseltier, Diamant writes in an explanatory "self-help" vein, for the many among us who feel both estranged from our traditions and too embarrassed to ask. The book contains several poems, including one by Rabbi Lawrence Troster of Toronto. (Schocken, $32).

Israeli Watercolors: The first artists to arrive in the land of Israel in this century used watercolors to record their impressions, and the medium remains one of the most beloved among Israeli painters today.

The Israel Museum in Jerusalem recently opened the exhibition Vision of Light: A Century of Watercolor in Israel, which features nearly 250 works by 80 of Israel's most prominent painters. Artists include Nahm Gutman, Yosef Zaritsky, Reuven Rubin, Leah Nikel and Menashe Kadishman.

At the Galleries:

• Approximately 25 members from the Willowdale Group of Artists are showing their paintings in the East Wing (2nd floor) of Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, Toronto, now until Feb. 17. Admission free.

• In keeping with artist Gary Silverberg's credo that "art is business, business is art," The Silverberg Line, his latest exhibition at Gallery One, is ostensibly a showing of paintings – but it is also a display of a new line of clothing and accessories. To Feb. 17. 121 Scollard Ave.

Objets d'art

Rothschild Collection: A magnificent collection of objets d'art that was formed by Baron Mayer de Rothschild (1818-1874) and continued by his son-in-law Archibald Philip, 5th Earl of Rosebery (1847-1929), goes on the Sotheby's auction block Feb. 11 in London. The items, which once filled Mentmore, the Rothschild mansion in Buckinghamshire, are expected to fetch more than 2.5 million pounds sterling.

Music and Theatre Notes:

• Toronto musicians Brian Katz and Martin Van de Ven perform klezmer classics Jan. 20 at 9:15 p.m. at the Mezetta Café, 681 St. Clair Ave. W. 658-5687.

• Classical violinist Moshe Hammer, jazz violinist Lenny Solomon and jazz pianist Bernie Senensky join forces as the Galaxy Trio to present great arrangements of familiar tunes, along with outstanding originals from Bach to Shearing. Rosedale United Church, 159 Roxborough Dr. Jan. 24, 8 p.m.

• Encore Entertainment presents Neil Simon's comedy Chapter Two at the new City Playhouse, 1000 New Westminster Dr. (corner Bathurst, south of Hwy. 407), Thornhill, from Jan. 21 to 31. The production, directed by Harvey Levkoe and produced by 22-year-old Lea Garbe, features a stellar cast led by Mario D'Alimonte. 8 p.m. nightly with Sunday matinees. $18-$16. 870-8000.

Arafat on Newsworld: If you're shomer Shabbat but also a political junkie, set your VCR to automatically record the program The Passionate Eye, Jan. 22 at 8 and 11 p.m. The featured segment, Arafat's Authority, looks into a litany of human rights violations, including torture and killings, carried out inside Palestinian jails.

According to a CBC Newsworld press release, the BBC-produced program "uncovers a web of judicial and political corruption that threatens PNA President Yasser Arafat's dual aim of peace with Israel and an independent Palestinian state."

Hot reading for winter blahs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If you're afflicted by cabin fever, the following guidebooks may help you break free and point you in the right direction.

Despite the occasional eruptions of terrorism, Israel remains a popular destination, offering biblical landscapes, magnificent ruins, fine beaches and pulsating cities. If you're ready to sample its wares, you'll want to read Daniel Jacobs' Israel & the Palestinian Territories (Penguin), a well-researched, cogently-written book packed with useful information. It's the only guidebook I know of that deals comprehensively with the Palestinian autonomous territories in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

Even in the depths of winter, Spain, Portugal, Greece and France bask in relatively temperate weather. If these countries sound appealing, you should snuggle up with Mediterranean Europe (Raincoast), which also includes entries on Morocco, Tunisia and Malta. A worthwhile companion volume is Mediterranean By Cruise Ship (Raincoast).

Costa Rica is truly alluring, beckoning visitors with smooth sandy beaches, pristine rainforests and charming colonial towns. If you're tempted, try reading The New Key to Costa Rica (Raincoast), which misses nothing.

If you're an outdoors buff, Inside Out British Columbia (Raincoast) should be of interest. It's your guide to the best skiing, hiking, camping, cycling, kayaking, canoeing, rafting and fishing in beautiful B.C.

If city life animates you, immerse yourself in Mexico City, Seattle and Berlin, published by Lonely Planet and all distributed by Raincoast.

More sedate travellers will be seduced by The Food Lover's Companion to Tuscany and The Garden Lover's Guide to Britain (Raincoast).

Last but not least, how about The Millennium Guide (Raincoast)? It's your ticket to events, festivals and parties around the world, including Israel, in 2000.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fifth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 25. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 11, 1999. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 18, 1999.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 25, 1999. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Israeli juniors sell out the house in Montreal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not often that Hatikvah gets played back to back with O Canada at a hockey rink, but last week in Montreal, 600 appreciative fans at the Samuel Moskovitch Arena enjoyed that treat.

The spectators ponied up $15 each for the privilege of watching their local heroes, Bialik High School Blues, take on the visiting Israeli national junior (under 17) team. Bialik, which is in first place in the Trans St. Lawrence Hockey Association standings with a 6-0 record, dispatched the visitors with a 7-5 victory.

Despite that competitive score, the game was less notable for the hockey on the ice, than for the feeling of brotherhood it stirred in the arena, said Bialik principal Raizel Candib. "It was a marvelous feeling, a feeling of unity," she said. "That feeling seemed pervasive throughout the whole game."

In addition to creating goodwill between the visiting Israeli teens and their Canadian counterparts, the game raised $8,000 to support the Israeli juniors. That money will help underwrite the costs of their participation in the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Pool D world junior (under 17) tournament in Sofia, Bulgaria later this winter.

The Israelis were accompanied to Montreal by Bennet Epstein, a New York lawyer with a passion for hockey. Epstein said the Israelis played two exhibition games in New York City prior to visiting Montreal (they won one, lost the other). While in the Big Apple, the boys took in a game at Madison Square Garden, met Jewish hockey star Mathieu Schneider, and were in absolute awe when Wayne Gretzky walked by, Epstein said.

NHL Cool Shots, an NHL-produced television program, was on hand to film part of their New York trip. A brief look at their visit was scheduled to air on the Madison Square Gardens network last week before a Rangers game.

From Montreal, the Israelis travelled to Lake Placid, N.Y. for a last exhibition game before winding up their nine-day visit and returning to Israel.

A visit to Toronto had been discussed, but according to Eli Rubenstein of UIA Canada, there wasn't enough time to pull the strings together to make it work. He's hopeful a trip to Toronto can be arranged the next time the Israelis visit North America.

For Epstein, the juniors' visit was the culmination of an association with Israeli hockey that goes back to the 1997 Maccabiah Games, but it all stems from his association with Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun and its hockey program. The KJ Lightning is a youth team drawn from the Manhattan-based Orthodox shul's membership, that plays in a New York City league.

Epstein, who played Senior B hockey until he broke his leg 10 years ago, coaches the Lightning. He brought the team to Israel for the 1997 Maccabiah, which featured hockey as a medal sport for the first time ever at the games.

Though not part of the games themselves, the Lightning played a series of exhibitions against the Israeli juniors, who are based in the Canada Centre rink in Metulla.

"The Israeli kids were blown away by it," Epstein said.

Epstein met the Israeli coach, Boris Mindel, a former Soviet emigre, and maintained ties with him after the team departed.

Last summer, Epstein, along with a few of the Lighting, and one player from Hockey in Harlem, a mostly black team that plays in New York, attended the Roger Neilson Hockey Camp in Metulla. Epstein served as a referee and a coach.

"There's no underestimating the good effect of that camp on Israeli hockey," he said.

The presence of an NHL coach and player, Danius Zubrus, tutoring Israeli youth, captured the attention of NHL Cool Shots, which dispatched producer Sal Guarna to film the camp. Two two-minute clips have already aired on the show while a third, featuring the player from Harlem, will be broadcast later in the year.

After the success of last year's hockey camp, Epstein began discussing with his synagogue board, the possibility of hosting the Israeli youngsters in New York. The congregation was excited about the idea but it was Maccabi USA which provided a "terrific grant" (he declined to be more specific) that got the show on the road, Epstein said.

Through the cooperation of Bialik hockey director Bob Nathan, who Epstein has known for years, a side trip to Montreal was arranged. Besides the game versus the Lightning, the Israeli youngsters also visited the school, attended classes, spoke to the Canadians in Hebrew, and updated them about life in Israel, Epstein said.

The trip has been a resounding success, he said.

"This is designed to try to get exposure for the program in Israel, create visibility, and with visibility, we hope, support. It also generates support for the Israeli people. You can contribute to Israel on different levels."

Epstein plans to be back in Metulla next summer for the third edition of the Neilson hockey camp, along with several of the Lightning and perhaps a couple of kids from Hockey in Harlem.

Kids at Bialik were so enthusiastic about the prospect, there's a chance some of them will visit Israel too, he said.

The camp is run with the cooperation of UIA Canada, which helped finance the Olympic-sized rink in Metulla.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My friend Jan and I have been close for many years. Here is a girl who is bright, funny and refreshing. She has a flair for words, always adding humor and wit to almost every story she tells.

She was a legal secretary in an office downtown on Bay Street. When we went out, we talked about things from the latest problems in the Middle East to the latest affairs in her office. She was always up on current events, and I admired how she could hold down a conversation with any stranger.

Jan had a baby about a year ago. Since then, all I hear from her is how much the baby ate or slept or pooped. If I try to initiate a conversation away from the topic of the baby, she zips right back with a story about how cute he was when he did this or that. She never returned to work, and I'm sure that is a big part of the problem.

I feel like I've lost a close and important peer in my life. Do you have any suggestions on how to get her back?

Boring Baby Blab

Dear Boring Baby Blab

Jan has entered a new phase in her life. She sounds like the kind of woman who puts her heart and soul into everything she does, and child rearing doesn't seem to be an exception.

The two of you are on different paths right now. Your life hasn't changed, but Jan's has changed completely. She is now responsible for the life of another human being. It's the most important job she'll ever have, and she is not taking it lightly.

She is enjoying motherhood with all its phases. Don't you think this is a difficult job and one that deserves a great deal of admiration and patience on your part? As her close friend, try to cut her some slack and go with the path your friendship has taken. Her child is here to stay, and eventually he won't be so completely encompassing, but right now, that baby depends on her for everything.

Now might be the time to get your fill of either office gossip or intellectual stimulation from someone else. Jan is in a nurturing mode. It's a great place to be. Try to learn from it and enjoy both her and her son.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Search for perfection

Editorial

We all know what the perfect school is. And we will recognize it if we ever find it.

Its philosophy, religiously and educationally, is completely in line with our own. Staff are fully qualified, supremely talented, inspiring, and able to instil discipline, while at the same time giving our children all the warmth, affection and encouragement they need. The staff will, of course, be in total agreement with our ideas, and fall in quickly with all our suggestions and requests.

While offering an enriched and extensive curriculum, the school will still make time to take the children on nature, cultural, historical and sports field trips, and any other variety of outing possible.

Needless to say, the cost will be infinitesimal.

Most of us realize that this is a pipe dream – that there is no such thing as a school that will be perfect for our children, let alone everyone else's. Perhaps that is why we are so critical about our educational system.

Certainly, even in a community like Toronto, where there are enough schools so that one should be able to come within hailing distance of the ideal, there are things to be critical of. Programs for the atypical child, whether he or she is learning disabled, developmentally delayed or gifted, are far too few and too poorly funded to fill the need. Fees for Jewish day schools make sending children, if not totally impossible, an incredible financial drain on the family.

Yet there is much to celebrate. Education is a priority among the Jewish communal agencies, and UJA Federation funds it at a higher rate than most other places. While the ideal is for every Jewish child to have at least some Jewish education, and Toronto has not reached that state of affairs, school populations, both day schools and supplementary schools, continue to grow.

There are encouraging signs that the Board of Jewish Education and individual schools are increasingly aware that students are not a monolithic body, and they are hiring staff and creating programs to identify and provide service to those who are different.

They are also becoming aware, slowly perhaps, that even the average child can need a special push in one area or another. This recognition is probably bolstered by the fact that parents are realizing more and more that the most wonderful child (theirs) may have a unique educational or behavioral requirement.

The annual education supplement attests to both the health and the shortcomings of the community. More attention is being paid to the learning disabled and special needs child. Existing schools are expanding, and new schools, such as the Heschel School and the Downtown Jewish Day School are thriving. An infusion of new staff, including shlichim from Israel and retirees from the public school system, are bringing innovative ideas and techniques that are surely a predictor of continued vitality. Yet much remains to be done.

From the earliest times, education has been a value inherent in the Jewish mind and heart. We may joke about searching for perfection in our schools, but it is that search that been both a guarantor of the survival of our people and our glory. –L.S.

New campus plans change as CHAT grows

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The increasing popularity of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) has led to problems in planning a new campus.

With an increase of 18 percent in enrolment in the past year (50 percent in the past four years), a projected enrolment of 1,100 next year and a pupil count of 1,500 to 2,000 expected in the next several years, the question of a new location for CHAT must be solved.

The Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) is no longer being considered, because the site it offers is not large enough, Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, director, Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation, told The CJN in his annual interview.

One of the options being considered is a two-campus CHAT, with improved quarters at its present Wilmington Avenue site and a new building north of Steeles Avenue, Rabbi Unterman said.

No decision has been made on the two-campus question, and no site outside Toronto has yet been chosen, he said.

Total enrolment in the Jewish day schools in Toronto was 10,974, including preschool and high school, an increase of three percent in the past year.

Enrolment in the supplementary (after hours) schools in the past year reached 6,231, down about one percent.

Though Jewish world trends indicate a significant expansion of Jewish education, both formal and informal, Rabbi Unterman said Toronto has to face the fact that 40 percent of the Jewish public school population (75 percent for high school), or about 13,000 children, are not getting any Jewish education, day school or supplementary.

"Assimilation is a real threat. It is eating away at our population. We need to be alert and not take things for granted," he said.

However, he is optimistic about the future of Jewish education. "Toronto is the most dedicated Jewish community I know of in terms of its support of Jewish education. The UJA Federation gives 50 percent of its funds locally to support Jewish education. When you add other measures, Toronto is giving more than double to support Jewish education [compared with] most other Jewish communities in North America."

There is greater appreciation of Jewish education in Canada than in the United States, he said, probably because the community here is closer to the traditions of European Jewry.

Those Jews who came to Toronto after World War II play a significant role, especially in the community's attachment to traditional roles, he said.

Speaking as a newcomer to Toronto, Rabbi Unterman expressed amazement that Jewish day schools are not getting any funding from the Ontario government and that parents of these students are paying school taxes in addition to annual tuitions at the day schools.

"Jews are being treated as second-class citizens in Ontario," he said. "I'm surprised that a Jewish community as large as this one [175,000] has not had mass demonstrations against the government's policy. It is simple immorality for Jews to have to pay taxes to support other people's education. The government talks about fair funding but simply ignores our needs."

Dori Levine gets new consulting post at BJE

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Dori Levine has been appointed to the new position of special education consultant by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

Levine served as principal of She'arim Hebrew Day School, a school for children with learning disabilities, from 1989 to 1996.

She was a teacher at She'arim since the school's inception in 1980, and from 1996 until her appointment at BJE, she was an educational consultant responsible for teacher training and supervision and individualized remedial programming for students.

Levine says she hopes to see a Jewish education system where any Jewish child can find a place.

Born and educated in Philadelphia, Levine moved to Toronto in 1969. She received a master's degree in education from the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education (OISE) in 1977.

She studied at Bar-Ilan University in Israel, and worked with Israeli psychologist Reuven Feuerstein, director of Hadassah-WIZO-Canada Research Institute in Jerusalem, where she developed her interest in special education.

Levine says Feuerstein "introduced me to the theory of cognitive modifiability – developing strategies for problem solving – and allowed me to gain experience in the use of Learning Potential Assessment Device (LPAD), a dynamic technique for assessing low-functioning individuals.

"The outgrowth of this method is the remediation program designed to focus on developing techniques for coping with deficiencies."

Using this assessment and remediation system, Levine worked with children, and trained teachers and other professionals to use the system. Upon her return to Toronto, she incorporated Feuerstein's theories and practices at She'arim.

Levine says that in her new position at BJE, "We are in the process of creating an inventory of special education needs in the Jewish educational community.

"As well, we would like to develop a resource base of special education services available in the community for parents and professionals.

"Where there is an unmet need, we will work with Jewish Vocational Service, Jewish Family and Child Service and other agencies to help create additional programs in the community."

Levine says that there are also children within the mainstream Jewish school classes who require special teaching techniques to deal with problems in language processing, motor coordination or organization and social skills.

Another important function of Levine's department, will be to help teachers work with student's who need special assistance, and to present training workshops and courses for the teachers.

Another goal, she says, is to help parents develop strategies to work effectively with their children. "We have to work as a team with the schools and the agencies."

Levine has taught at Holy Blossom Temple since 1969, and currently, is coordinator and supervisor of the Project Tikvah Hebrew remedial program for special needs students. She is also educational consultant at the Downtown Jewish Day School.

"My ultimate goal at BJE is to provide a continuum of special services to every Jewish child with individual needs."

Reed helps promote Holocaust studies

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Holocaust is not just a Jewish issue, according to Carole Ann Reed, the director of education of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of UJA Federation.

"It is a human issue, a major event in human history to me," she says. "My interest in the Holocaust began with an exploration of discrimination; it has been a lifelong obsession."

Reed, who is not Jewish, is currently developing curricula for classroom teachers on Holocaust-related issues, including human rights education, racism and other forms of discrimination. She also gives professional development workshops to elementary and secondary school teachers in public and separate schools.

Born and educated in Toronto, Reed received a master's degree in philosophy at the University of Guelph, focusing on minorities and class issues. She received a doctorate in 1993 at the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education (OISE), with research on the Holocaust and anti-racism.

While at OISE, she served as an equity coordinator who advised the director on a variety of human rights issues.

She had a short term contract as an educational consultant at the Holocaust Centre prior to her appointment as director of education.

"Most kids are introduced to the Holocaust through literature," she says. "Nothing grabs you like reading a story about the Holocaust."

One of her first major projects was a Holocaust education publication package for English literature teachers with suggested topics for discussion, a short historical summary of Holocaust events, an annotated bibliography and videography, and ideas for other classroom activities.

"Although Holocaust-related topics are most often suggested for history courses, we believe that the rich literature emanating from the Holocaust not only offers a compelling introduction to the subject matter, but also communicates a deep understanding about the human consequences of those events," she says.

She and her co-worker, Dr. Paula Draper, teach courses and offer special events for teachers. In the spring, they will present a six-session professional development course for teachers on Holocaust issues.

"At the Holocaust Centre, we work with the Jewish community, which is still coming to terms with the Holocaust, and we respond to requests from other communities," Reed says.

Recently, a group of Rwandans visited the centre for a tour of the museum and a meeting with Jewish survivors of the Holocaust.

"There are a number of Rwandan survivors here who called for help and support. They are coming to terms with the genocide in Rwanda in 1994. They feel that Jewish survivors are the only people who can understand what they went through and what they are still going through."

Carole Ann Reed

The wife of the president of Rwanda, who was in Toronto to support a fundraising for Rwandan orphans, asked to visit the Holocaust Centre, Reed says. "[She] was moved to tears and said that she found the visit very poignant."

Activities such as the Rwandan visit are making the Holocaust pertinent to a broader community. "It is our responsibility to protect and entrench the memory of the past and to warn against the apathy and indifference which allowed the Holocaust to happen."

In 1989, Reed was awarded the Rabbi Isserman Prize by the University of Toronto for the undergraduate or graduate essay that best contributes to peace or furthers human understanding. She was a visiting professor at York University's Faculty of Education, is the author of numerous journal articles on Holocaust education issues, and she has delivered many professional conference papers.

Reed is a member of the Holocaust Education sub-committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Led by Reed, the Holocaust Centre is negotiating with OISE to create a collaborative program to confer a certificate in Holocaust education.

BJE committee raises awareness of gifted students within Jewish school system

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For a long time, Jewish educators touted the dual curriculum of the Jewish day school as an adequate challenge for gifted children.

"Really it's only in the last years that people have come around to a different way of thinking," said Lucy Cohen, director of education at United Synagogue Day School and chair of the Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) eight-person committee for children with special talents.

The BJE group, a subcommittee of its day school principals association, was formed almost two years ago as a result of concerns expressed by parents of gifted students who felt their children's needs were not being met in the day school system.

Its mandate, in part, is to offer schools an information base, to be kept at the BJE, as a programming resource, said Cohen. Committee members have looked at various options for addressing the needs of gifted students and those who can benefit from additional challenge without necessarily being defined as gifted.

The possibility of a separate school for gifted Jewish children has not been ruled out, but the committee "thought it might be difficult" because of the variety of Jewish ideologies which it would have to accommodate, and because they wanted to explore the question of enrichment.

"It's obvious we do have a significant percentage of our school population who are good and fast learners," said Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, executive director of the BJE. "We need to provide proper services for the top-notch kids, so we won't lose them."

The committee has succeeded in raising the level of awareness about gifted education within the Jewish school system, said Cohen. "All the schools are now addressing it much more seriously."

If children are unhappy in class because they're not having their educational needs met, she noted, they might become disruptive or withdraw. "People don't really understand. They think it should be a cinch."

Giftedness is a special need, just as dyslexia and attention deficit disorder are special needs, stressed one mother who removed her child from the day school system in frustration a few years ago.

Gifted children think differently and process information differently, she noted. "They think very deeply and sophisticatedly. Often they skip steps."

The mother, who preferred not to be named, searched in vain for a Jewish day school that would suit her child's needs.

Another day school student (who happens to be the daughter of this reporter) became frustrated and bored when long periods were spent on concepts that she grasped immediately. Although she excelled academically and was happy socially, Sari developed an extremely negative attitude toward school and anything that reminded her of it.

After psycho-educational assessment and lengthy discussions with her general studies principal at Associated Hebrew Schools, it was decided she could skip from Grade 5 to Grade 7.

Vertical acceleration, as Cohen terms it, may help with some of the content, she said, but there are social issues to consider as well. She believes a preferable option is "lateral" enrichment within the student's own grade level.

Sari, whose transition was remarkably smooth, is now in Grade 8. We felt – and still feel – that skipping a grade was the best option at the time.

This year, Associated started an enrichment program for grades 1 to 6, with two teachers serving as "special talents coordinators" for the school's three branches.

"Their task is to work with teachers, in order to ensure that children are getting that additional stimulation they need," said Sandy Rabinowitz, general studies principal at the school's Kamin branch.

"It's not more work faster," he noted. The emphasis, rather, is on thinking-type questions and intellectual stimulation.

Teachers provide differentiated programs for students who are able and willing to take on the additional challenge, he said.

"It's a more individualistic way of teaching. Not everyone in the class has to do the same work on a particular topic. We don't want it to be seen as a gifted program as such."

Other schools are moving in the same direction. Leo Baeck Day School puts emphasis on dealing with individual differences and hired a consultant this year, said school director Zita Gardner.

JCS helps to keep students connected to Judaism

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

Keeping post-secondary students connected to Judaism is more challenging now than ever, says Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS).

"We don't live in an age of great issues – there's no Soviet Jewry, there's no Ethiopian Jewry, so student activism and involvement takes on a different form... You have to be more creative in getting students involved," Kaye says.

For JCS, that view has led to a re-examination of its approach to serving Toronto's college and university students. JCS has begun to move away from enticing students into its campus offices towards engaging with them both on and off campus.

The umbrella agency, now in its fourth year, is serving an estimated 15,000 Jewish students, which include approximately 4,000 at both York University and the University of Toronto (U of T), and some 1,200 at Ryerson. In total, they represent about 85 percent of Toronto Jews aged 18 to 25, Kaye says.

"The credo these days is maximizing the number of Jews 'doing Jewish' with other Jews," Kaye says.

"It's basically a two-track process of engagement and empowerment" designed to attract less committed and unaffiliated Jews, as well as stimulating those who come from strong Jewish backgrounds, he says.

Kaye, 51, had been the director of the Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation from 1990 to 1995 until he was recruited to help establish JCS by UJA Federation, the main source of funding for U of T's Jewish Students' Union, York's Jewish Student Federation and Ryerson's Jewish Campus Services.

JCS currently employs 10 staff members, including one full-time employee at each of the university campuses. JCS operates on an annual budget of $600,000, $420,000 of which comes from UJA Federation.

Kaye says JCS inherited "a high degree of disorganization" when it was created in May 1995 as an independent beneficiary agency of UJA Federation to "oversee all informal Jewish student activity on [post-secondary] campuses in the Greater Toronto Area."

The separate organizations at U of T, York and Ryerson suffered from declining participation rates, little city-wide coordination and the impression that they were mainly frequented by nerds and Orthodox students, he says.

"You had a dying structure at York and a dying structure at U of T, and they were run as separate entities."

One of the first things JCS did was update the mailing lists kept by the separate campus organizations.

Today it has a mailing list of 3,000 active members, representing about 20 percent of its estimated target group.

It uses the list to contact students by mail and phone for city-wide and school-specific events. It also advertises in The CJN and campus papers, as well as in Now and Eye, when trying to reach students less formally affiliated with the Jewish community. This past September it established a Web site, www.jewishcampusservices.com, to inform students about its programs.

'City-wide approach'

Kaye and his staff have instituted "a city-wide approach" to the delivery of services, to reach commuter students where they live. As a result, more and more JCS programs are being held off campus.

Kaye proudly cites some new initiatives developed since 1995. One is the JCS annual Arts Festival, held for the first time last March at the North York Public Library Central Branch.

The festival led to the hiring of a full-time staff-person, Tamar Kagan, to encourage students, particularly unaffiliated students, "to express their Jewishness through the arts."

This year's festival, Coloring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Student Creativity, takes place March 7 to 10.

Another successful program has been the twice-yearly Beit Midrash, a night of study which brings together students "from different backgrounds or no background" to discuss "very contemporary themes" with scholars from the various denominations of Judaism. Kaye says the program has always attracted more than 100 students per session.

JCS also runs a yearly awards night to honor its campus leaders, and a leadership development program, which this month will take campus leaders to Boston to learn how to initiate and develop new campus programs.

The agency sponsors other off-campus events, like Shabbatonim, a yearly science and Halachah seminar for Orthodox students and a Jewish awareness month, which includes a create-your-own mezuzah class and a Jewish cooking seminar.

Kaye boasts that JCS has established new partnerships with "the KKK," the Orthodox Kedma, the Conservative Koach and the Reform Kesher services, which develop social and religious programs for their affiliated students across the continent.

"I'm particularly proud of the partnership initiative, because it really brought into the campus, communities that were not previously involved," Kaye says, adding that Toronto is the only community in North America to have student organizations affiliated with all three streams served by professional staff, funded jointly by JCS and their religious streams.

"Pluralism is a big plank on which we base our philosophy – recognizing differences, but building a sense of community," he says.

Current staffing levels are not ideal, Kaye says, citing a Council of Jewish Federations study done in the early 1990s, which recommends five staff members for a campus with 4,500 Jews. JCS maintains only one program director at both York and U of T, supplemented by city-wide staff.

According to Kaye a key problem is lack of funds. "Our [annual operating budget] should really be $1 million," he says, "the minimum needed to do a decent job."

Reaching that level would require more UJA Federation dollars. Although Kaye declines to specify the ideal annual budget, he notes that Toronto spends about $30 a year per student on student services for its 15,000 students, while Vancouver's Jewish community spends roughly $208 for each of its 1,200 students.

Kaye says he expects to receive more money from UJA Federation now that fundraising is returning to pre-recession levels and legacy endowment fundraising is up and running.

He says the legacy campaign beginning this month hopes to raise an endowment fund to generate operating revenue, as well as $2 million for a new building at Huron and Harbord to house the U of T branch of JCS. Construction is slated to begin this spring and to be completed by 2000.

In the future, Kaye says, JCS would like to better serve students at U of T's Scarborough College – where there is no JCS office – and the community colleges. JCS also needs to expand beyond serving undergraduates, currently its main focus, he says.

"Graduate students are a major constituency that we serve in only a perfunctory manner, but we need to serve more seriously."

York prepares teachers for Jewish system

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish teacher education program at York University is supplying a new breed of teachers – young, homegrown and equally qualified to teach Jewish and general studies.

"One of the pleasures of my work," said Alex Pomson, who has headed the program for the past two and a half years, is being involved with a group of students who "really reflect the diversity of the Jewish community."

Day school graduates make up the majority of students in the program. They run the gamut from alumni of Bais Yaakov High School for Girls to Bialik Hebrew Day School, working alongside and learning from each other in an "exemplary" way, noted Pomson.

The almost 20-year-old program, believed to be the first of its kind, has been a well-kept secret, he said. But word is spreading.

Over the last five years the program, which offers a joint BA/B.Ed., has had more applicants than it can accept. There are currently 24 students, of whom seven will graduate this year. At its inception, there were only two. And there are now over 50 alumni.

The program's growth, albeit relatively modest, parallels a Diaspora-wide growth in day school education. "Our graduates are really quite a valuable commodity," said Pomson.

Until this year his position was the only professorship in Jewish education at a non-sectarian university outside of Israel. He gives much credit to the Israel Koschitzky Family Foundation, which partly funds his position and which recently provided funding for a chair in Jewish Education, which is expected to be filled in the next few years.

The Jewish Teacher Education program has become "much more seen by people outside Toronto as a potential partner in all kinds of initiatives."

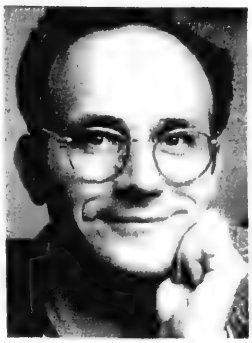
Recently Pomson has had inquiries from western Canada about training local day school graduates to return there and teach.

He also fields calls regularly from the United States requesting graduates to fill teaching positions.

Demand far outstrips supply, he said. "Over the last two or three years pretty much every graduate [not pursuing post-graduate studies] has found a job. Anyone who's graduated successfully is going to probably find themselves faced by a choice as far as where they should look for work."

It's a shame, he says, that there are not more men in the program. "Many schools still look to men to fill senior positions, particularly in the Orthodox world," he said.

Still, he notes, there is a slightly higher proportion of male students than in the general education program, perhaps 15 percent.



Alex Pomson

Pomson estimates the general education program has no more than five percent male students.

He does not see the program's graduates supplanting Israeli shlichim, who have been a teaching staple at many Jewish day schools. "Shlichim bring something very special to schools. It was always envisioned that Jewish day schools would benefit most from a mixture of home-grown talent and shlichim."

These days the program has been able to "be more ambitious in the kinds of things we're able to offer our students," said Pomson.

This month there is an intensive educational retreat for students, the second of its kind. Dr. Ora Zohar of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem is to staff the retreat as well as one for day school principals.

Last year the program began offering post-graduate studies. Four students are working toward their masters of education.

"This is a very significant step forward," said Pomson.

The program is also involved in a number of professional development programs for teachers. A major conference on New Directions in Jewish Education is planned for March, for teachers, professionals and lay people.

Another project is aimed at meeting the non-academic needs of Jewish students. "The hope is that by creating a team of teachers who would be trained to help schools meet students' emotional and social needs, we can bring a resource to the school for development in this area."

Pomson is still involved in research he began in his native England and has continued here, based on day school teachers' diaries. The research is winding up, and Pomson has begun to publish his results.

"Even in Israel," Pomson said, "there aren't many people doing research with teachers. People do research about teachers or on the teachers, but [not] through the words of teachers. Any discussion about the role of Jewish day schools would be ill informed without a perspective provided by teachers, and ideally in the teachers' own words."

Associated system growing

Education committee explores middle school

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's biggest Jewish day school system is pondering how it can get even bigger.

Keeping up with the growth of Toronto and York Region's Jewish community hasn't been easy for Associated Hebrew Day Schools. Over the past few years, Associated has seen the opening of its 1,000-student Kamin branch in Thornhill; the demolition and re-opening of its Neptune (Posluns) campus; the closing (at least temporarily) of the Hurwich campus on Finch; and the consolidation of its junior high classes (grades 7 and 8) at the Danilack branch on Leslie.

In all, the system serves over 2,000 children from nursery to Grade 8.

But the thought on the minds of many parents is what will become of the Finch campus, which was closed last June pending the outcome of a study that is examining the feasibility of a middle school for grades 6, 7 and 8.

The school's vaad hachinuch (education committee) is currently looking into whether a middle school is appropriate, says Associated's president, Lou Greenbaum. A decision could come as soon as next month.

The point of having a middle school, he pointed out, is to make students' transition into the higher grades easier by placing them in one building.

If officials opt for a middle school, the decision would then be whether to have it at the Danilack or the Hurwich branch, Greenbaum told The CJN.

If the idea for a middle school is turned down, then officials will have another decison: whether to keep the junior high classes, with their 400 students, at Danilack, or move them to Hurwich.

Greenbaum said a study is also being done on the Hurwich branch's physical capacities to house a middle-school, "just to be ready."

"The only advantage [to a middle school] would be one of education," Greenbaum said. "Would it be in the students' best interests?"

Finch branch closed

The demographics of the community must also be weighed, he noted, especially given the mushrooming Jewish population north of Steeles Avenue.

The branch on Finch was closed following the last academic year because the campus on Neptune reopened after a three-year hiatus, during which the original building was demolished and a new $4.2 million school built a bit west.

The new 35,000-square foot Louis and Leah Posluns Education Centre houses 400 students from nursery to Grade 6, and features four pre-school rooms, 12 elementary classrooms, a combination gym/lunch room, a library and two soft-surface playgrounds.

The junior high classes that had been at the Neptune branch were transferred to the Hurwich branch and then, beginning this school year, were consolidated at the Danilack campus.

Most of the elementary students displaced by the closing of the Finch campus have come to the new Neptune campus, according to Betty Katzman, the branch's new Hebrew studies principal who had taught for 17 years and is herself an Associated graduate.

Schools helping special needs students

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Meeting the special needs of children at all levels of Jewish supplementary and day schools is becoming more of a priority.

Judit Kenyeres, head of special education and remediation at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), says, "CHAT is a unique Jewish high school. We are the only school to offer such a comprehensive special education and remediation program."

The program is geared to students with an average or above average capacity to learn, but with weaknesses in particular areas of learning such as organization of ideas in written form, organizational problems, self-management weaknesses, organizing a schedule, or keeping track of their materials, she says.

In CHAT's regular stream, 40 students take part in remedial programs once a week with the school's five remedial staff members. As well, there are 25 students who come when they require extra help.

CHAT also has special education classes in grades 9 and 10 in both general and Jewish studies courses. "We help these students work towards full integration into the regular stream for grades 11 and 12.

"The special education students have a teacher who advocates on their behalf [when] they are integrated into the regular stream."

The CHAT population is growing quickly, and Kenyeres says that next year, CHAT's staff expects that the demands for assisting special needs students will grow.

Holy Blossom Temple's Project Tikvah is a special needs program for children with a learning disability, an attention deficit disorder (ADD) or any other special need.

Dori Levine, coordinator of Project Tikvah, says that the program was developed to enable any child to successfully become a bar or bat mitzvah.

The children receive Hebrew instruction on an individual or small group basis. In addition, they participate in the mainstream religious school classes. "At their bar or bat mitzvah ceremony, these children are usually indistinguishable from [the other students.] We know that we have empowered our students. For many, this is their first successful learning experience."

Full Hebrew program

The Dr. Abraham Shore Academy, She'arim Hebrew Day School, is an independent communal day school for Jewish children with learning disabilities and attention deficit hyperactive disorder (ADHD). The school offers a full Hebrew and general studies program for grades 1 to 8. There are 68 students at all levels, in nine classes.

Kathy Manoim, She'arim's principal, says the philosophy of the school is based on Reuven Feuerstein's theories. "We focus on teaching students thinking strategies – how to think and how to learn by means of strategies that will enhance their coping skills."

She says that the students who have difficulties in auditory or visual processing, or verbal or written expression, are mainstreamed into classes in the Jewish day schools when they acquire the necessary skills.

After Grade 8, the students go into a Jewish high school, yeshiva or public high school.

Students at She'arim are referred from other Jewish day schools, Jewish Vocational Services, Jewish Family and Child Service or by parents. They require a psycho-educational assessment.

Manoim says programs such as gym, music or art, are integrated into other subjects. For example, a specialist works with teachers and students to develop an art project based on the curriculum being studied in history. In Hebrew class, students may learn about Chanukah, and make a chanukiyah.

She adds, "We also provide parenting programs and support services to families. "

Zareinu Educational Centre, a Jewish day school and treatment-centre, provides special educational therapies for 55 students with a wide range of developmental and/or physical challenges.

Carol Goldman, principal, notes that each individually designed program meets the unique needs of children between the ages of one month to 13 years old.

"Our philosophy is based on the belief that each 'special child' is a valuable member of our community, and has the right to an adapted education, the opportunity for improving life skills, a respect for their strengths, as well as a focus on their needs.

"The family must be an integral part of our efforts; their input and their participation in planning programs for their child is encouraged."

Goldman says that "Zareinu provides a wide variety of programs, and new and innovative therapies. We have even been pioneers in introducing new therapies to the field."

Zareinu's Project Outreach provides home outreach to the parents, and awareness sensitivity education for students and teachers in Hebrew day schools, in order to encourage the social inclusion and acceptance of children with special needs.

Goldman notes that through funding provided by Jewish Federation,"We have joined efforts with the Reena Foundation and Jewish Family and Child Service to increase community service and social integration for children and families with special needs."

USDS staff expands to accommodate growth

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

As a result of its growth since 1961, United Synagogue Day School (USDS) has increased its staff to more than 200 teachers, administrators and support staff.

In an interview, Brian Krasman, new principal of the Bathurst campus, said, "We pride ourselves on focusing on the individual child in the program."

Gail Silver, principal at the Bayview campus, added that "as a Conservative Hebrew day school, we celebrate life cycle events through special holiday programs at every level, bringing a partnership of home and school. We encourage family members to participate in our events."

One of the key issues at the school, Krasman said, is combining the general and Judaic studies. "We operate on a thematic approach. Teachers from both departments work together to coordinate programs such as Chanukah."

Silver emphasized the importance of the school's derech eretz (respect to others) program, which aims to instil Jewish values, such as respect for individuals (for example, through the school's anti-bullying protocol) and peaceful problem solving.

"Conflict resolution skills are built in from the primary grades, and spiral through the curriculum," Krasman said.

"USDS has a reputation for excellence, and we continually review our policies and practices, and make adjustments as necessary," he said.

He described some of the schools innovative programs: peer tutoring, where students in the higher grades volunteer to help younger students academically; Grade 6 peacemakers, who work to resolve problems for other students; and staff members who play a direct mentoring role in the students' preparation of a d'var Torah for bar or bat mitzvah.

Starting in Grade 1, the teachers in the lab-centered computer program work with classroom teachers to integrate their curriculum needs into appropriate computer activities.

"Youngsters learn their curriculum while they develop their computer skills," Krasman said. "By Grade 3, they are learning the elements of touch typing and have experience with spread sheets and a database. By the time students graduate, they are fully conversant with desktop publishing."

Krasman noted that 70 percent of USDS graduates go on to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Furthermore, "a number of staff members are graduates of USDS. We pride ourselves on continuity – from generation to generation," he said.

Brian Krasman

Gail Silver

Krasman brings more than 30 years teaching and administrative experience in the public and Hebrew school systems. Born in Toronto, he studied at the University of Toronto and Brock University. He taught and was a department head at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate, was principal at Yeshivat Or Chaim/Ulpanat Orot, and vice-principal at several public high schools, most recently at C. W. Jeffereys.

Silver joined the USDS staff in 1979, teaching grades 5 to 8. She served as an administrative assistant and vice-principal at the Bathurst campus for five years prior to accepting her new position.

"As a teacher and principal at USDS for almost two decades," Silver said, she finds that "USDS works hard to create a warm, nurturing environment for students, staff and parents—it is an extended family."

Another staff member at USDS for several years is Gilda Iron, principal at the Richmond Hill campus since 1994. Iron taught at the Bathurst and Bayview campuses, and was general studies coordinator at Richmond Hill for a year prior to becoming the principal.

USDS is a member of the Solomon Schechter Day School Association, the educational arm of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, and is supported by many of the Conservative synagogues in Toronto.

gram, a non-denominational supplementary program, was founded 19 years ago.

Zeev Greenberg, director of the school explained that "there was a glaring need [for such a school] for children, ages 6 to 14, who have severe to moderate learning disabilities."

The school, which meets for 4 ½ hours on Sunday mornings, has 26 students. The educational curriculum is divided into two main programs – Jewish heritage and identity, and Hebrew as a modern language. "One of our goals is to get them to bar or bat mitzvah and enable them to read from the prayer book.

"We structure the classes to provide a harmonious learning environment in the class based on the specific challenges of the individual child."

Greenberg noted that some of the students attend specialty schools such as Adventure Place and Willowood School.

"Upon recommendation, some of our students get referred to She'arim or other schools, and conversely, we've had children who are referred to us from other congregational schools."

Greenberg, who has been with Tikvat Hayim for 18 years, says that many of the students come long distances. "One of our students, who comes from the Toronto island community attends regularly."

'CJN students' facing new challenges

This year marks the eighth annual instalment of our series on four Toronto young people whom we first met as they were celebrating their respective bar and bat mitzvahs. The series will culminate next year.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Now that Ali Bresver, Naomi Emerson, Chaim Greenwald and Jacob Korenblum are all out of high school, it's harder than ever to schedule a joint interview.

Coincidentally, Chaim, Naomi and Jacob were all in Israel from mid-April until the beginning of June.

Chaim, 20, who attended Eitz Chaim Day School and the Wisconson Institute of Torah Study, was studying at the Chafetz Chaim Yeshiva in Jerusalem. He is now in his second year there.

Naomi, a 19-year-old graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and Ulpanat Orot, was completing a year at a women's yeshiva.

And Jacob, 19, an alumnus of Bialik Hebrew Day School and Northern Secondary School, was there with a friend. They spent four months travelling after high school finished. Aside from Israel, they visited Morocco, Egypt, France, Spain, Germany and England, seeking out links with local Jewish communities.

"I definitely have a greater awareness of different ways of expressing Judaism," said Jacob when he was interviewed with Naomi at The CJN's Toronto office.

He and his friend often discussed whether they really felt a link with Jews they met in other countries, he said. "For instance, in Morocco they were so vastly different from us. [But] ultimately we have to say, yes we did. There was something that superseded all the cultural differences."

While in Israel, Jacob and his friend made a concerted effort to speak to Arabs who could communicate in English. "From our heritage we only get an insight into one side," he explained. "I really wanted to get a good idea of both sides of the story."

They also spent time with Israelis and spoke to a number of Israeli soldiers. The Hebrew that Jacob learned at Bialik came back to him, he said, and he "got around just fine."

Chaim, in Jerusalem, finds it "amazing to see people living their lives based on religion as opposed to religion being secondary. It's had a profound impact on me."

He would like to pursue a career in Jewish education and said he would probably enter his yeshiva's smichah program.

Although he hasn't completely ruled out secular university studies, he feels it is more important for him now to concentrate on his religious education.

He expects he will end up returning to North America to live; as an English speaker, he figures his skills, once he completes his education, will be more in demand on this side of the ocean.

At the yeshiva he doesn't have much "exposure" to newspapers, but finds the news he does hear is "so often the same as in the past couple of years."

He believes that Israel should give up land if doing so will save lives. "If not, then not. The land of Israel is very precious to us, [but] I've heard from prestigious rabbis that the Jewish people has not existed based on land. Having land is not one of those mitzvot that supersedes life."

Concerned about anti-Jewish attitudes among some Palestinians

Naomi, who is also Orthodox, is concerned about anti-Jewish attitudes among some Palestinians. "I'm not anti-peace, but it doesn't make sense to me that we make peace with them under current conditions. I hope I'm wrong. I hope we can reach peace, but with the terrorism that's happened so far, it doesn't seem like it's possilbe."

Having spent last year in Elkana, just outside the Green Line, she said she takes exception to the use of the term "settlers" in the media.

"I think they're just people who have moved there and were encouraged by the government to move. The people I met are such sincerely good, decent religious people. It boggles my mind how the world makes them out to be these crazy fanatic settlers. Obviously, not everyone is the way they're portrayed. You have extremists on both sides."

Naomi is back in Toronto studying kinesiology at York University, which she hopes will lead to a therapy career. She is also volunteering on a weekly basis with children who have severe disabilities.

She is adjusting to living at home again, as well as to being at a secular university.

"I have lived somewhat of a sheltered life," she said. "I find it fascinating what a mix there is [at York]."

She is comfortable fielding questions about Judaism from non-Jewish students, but found it disconcerting to hear the professor at her very first lecture using swear words. "It threw me off. This is supposed to be an institution of higher education."

Although it's a new experience, she finds university here "anti-climactic" after her year in Israel. And perhaps more difficult for her is the conflict she feels between her love of life here and in Israel. "I feel very much caught between two worlds," she said.

She feels her year away has changed her, but doubts the changes are apparent to others. "I did grow. I think a lot more about different issues. I look at improving who I am as a person and my religious self. It's not like I'm jumping to go on a different path, but I'm much more interested in learning for the sake of learning."

In past years she has expressed a desire to make aliyah, but this year spoke more cautiously. "You don't know where life will take you... I don't want to look like one of those people who have their heads in the clouds."

Jacob, unlike Naomi, is convinced he does not want to live in Israel. "Being there a month and a half confirmed the idea that I will never live there. It's such an aggressive society... [We] saw real incidents of prejudice and racism – Ashkenazi/Sephardi, religious/secular, and really antagonistic views and statements."

Jacob, true to his longtime goal, is studying International Relations at the University of Toronto. Coincidentally, he received the same scholarship once awarded to his grandfather, and is living in residence downtown.

Although he finds U of T students take their studies seriously, "the place never sleeps. I can still try to be disciplined and just lock my door, but it's really hard."

For Chanukah, Jacob organized candlelighting in his residence. He usually goes home for Shabbat, he said. "Judaism is important to me."

Jacob's faith remains unshaken following the death of his mother, Toba, in November, of cancer. "It's difficult when things happen that there's no logical explanation for. At times like that you need your faith... There are a lot of positive things that continue to happen. I'm an optimistic person in general."

Ali, 19, an alumna of Temple Emanu-El's supplementary school and of Lawrence Park Collegiate, still doesn't know if she believes in God, but is "definitely still very proud of being Jewish and wouldn't change that for anything."

She has wanted for a long time to be a sports journalist and is now in the journalism program at King's College in Halifax. She was in Toronto briefly over the winter holidays before going on vacation with her family.

Ali Bresver

Chaim Greenwald

Naomi Emerson

Jacob Korenblum

Like Jacob, Ali lives in residence. She has found the biggest adjustment is dealing with money and bill payments.

She has learned, however, to budget her time, and tackles essays and assignments ahead of time instead of at the last minute. "It's so much less work that way," she said.

For Ali, who has been active in the Reform movement all her life, it's a new experience being in a community where there is no Reform congregation.

She attended Yom Kippur services at the Conservative synagogue and found the congregation "very welcoming."

Although she talked last year of looking into teaching Sunday school again once she entered university, she decided that, this year, she would focus on adjusting to campus life.

Students discuss challenges facing youth

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Last fall, a group of grade 10 and 11 students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) visited Grade 8 classes at Associated Hebrew Schools as part of a drug education program sponsored by Parents Against Drugs (PAD).

The high school students, who underwent an intensive two-day training program, discussed some of the challenges facing youngsters today, and led their younger peers in role-playing exercises as part of a peer education program entitled Challenges, Beliefs and Changes.

The program is now in its third year at CHAT; Leo Baeck Day School has also participated.

Over three sessions, students talked about the stress of growing up and some of the issues they may be confronting, said CHAT guidance counsellor Mirna Alter. "It went extremely well."

The older students were trained and selected to talk about their own transition to high school, and the good decisions they made despite the pressure they experienced, she said. Having students close in age to serve as positive role models is an integral part of the program.

With the help of videos and prescribed activities, students discuss factual information about drugs, as well as how they might respond in different scenarios – such as unsupervised parties – involving alcohol, tobacco or drugs.

"We're moving away from constant threatening — 'don't, don't' — and emphasizing positive things you can do," said Elizabeth Segal, coordinator of student activities at the junior high. "We heard about [the program] and thought it might be a good way to enhance our drug education program."

Grade 8 student Shael Markin, 13, said he learned a lot. "Students participated a little more [because the facilitators were] kids their age."

Associated includes drug education as part of its health classes. Students learn about use and abuse of a variety of drugs, including tobacco, alcohol and prescription drugs, said Segal.

"The thing we put an emphasis on is awareness...to teach students how to handle [potentially dangerous situations]."

The 30 group leaders, each of whom worked with a small group of younger children, also found the program a learning experience.

"I learned things about drugs that I had not known," said Ilana Blidner, a 16-year-old Grade 11 student. There were definitely lessons she'll be able to apply in her own life, she said.

Neil Rogachevsky, also 16 and in Grade 11, considers the program "a worthwhile cause. It provided good information."

Planning for 'gifted' students

Similarly, Netivot Hatorah Day School now has a part-time teacher responsible for dealing with enrichment at all grade levels.

"I think it's a good step," said Netivot vice-principal Rabbi Elliott Diamond, "but I don't think we've finished."

Throughout the day school system, limited resources have made it difficult to address gifted children's needs when there were other pressing needs to juggle, Rabbi Diamond noted. "You want to provide everyone with as much as you can."

Bialik Hebrew Day School, which in the past has provided enrichment on an ad hoc basis, last year began planning a program to provide "extensions" for students at all levels of ability, to help them reach the next level, said Bialik's principal, Uri Korin.

Planning such a program can be a lengthy process, Korin noted. It involves approval by the school's board, funding and teacher training.

"I'm taking it very slowly in order to ensure that when we do it, we will do it in a way that will be beneficial for the students," he added.

Like Rabinowitz and Cohen, Korin shies away from the term "gifted." He prefers to talk about providing "an opportunity for everyone to reach his or her potential."

Defining the term "gifted," he said, is "a major issue."

The term "multiple intelligences," signifying abilities in different areas, not necessarily academic, came up in several of the interviews for this article.

The Toronto Heschel School, an arts-based, non-denominationally affiliated school in its third year of operation, is "the first day school in town to understand the learning process of a gifted child," said the mother mentioned earlier. Her child is now "thriving" there, she said.

Heschel operates on "skill group levels," said the school's general studies director Gail Baker. Students, even those working two or three grade levels above their own, work at their level within the classroom.

"We prefer to keep children with their peer group for a variety of reasons, mostly social," Baker said.

Also, on occasion, students from different classes are taken out of the classroom to work in small groups on specialized projects.

Gifted children need to be taught, not just given work to do independently, said Baker.

PA 'preparing children for war'

Researcher levels charge

TORONTO — The school curricula developed by the Palestinian Authority (PA) is preparing Arab children for war, not for peace, an Israeli researcher has charged.

David Bedein, media analyst with the Israel Resource News Agency in Jerusalem, said five years after the Oslo agreement promised peaceful coexistence, the curriculum being taught in schools under the PA's jurisdiction displays "an attitude towards the inspiration of war. It is a war curriculum."

Bedein said his research found no examples of materials or lessons that promoted peaceful coexistence.

A native of Philadelphia who has lived in Israel for 28 years, Bedein was in Toronto last week to address a public meeting sponsored by the Toronto Zionist Council.

Family reunion an emotional affair

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Justine Mbabazi has a message for Toronto's Jewish community:

"Thank you."

It's a simple but heartfelt expression of gratitude from the Rwandan single mother, who was reunited with her five children last week after not seeing them for 18 months.

"I'm so really impressed with the Jewish community," Mbabazi gushes. "You have a solidarity."

Why all the praise?

Mbabazi, a 28-year-old widow who survived Rwanda's 1994 genocide, in which over one million Tutsi and moderate Hutus were butchered by Hutu extremists, turned to the Jewish community for help to reunite her with her kids, whom she left behind when she fled to Canada in 1997.

The community came through:

Thanks to the efforts of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre; Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee; El Al; and Prof. Howard Adelman of York University, Mbabazi and her children were together again in a tearful scene at Toronto's Pearson Airport.

"They were grabbing me and shouting, 'Mommy, Mommy!'" the joyous woman recalled in an exclusive interview with The CJN.

Later, on the day of their arrival from Nairobi via Tel Aviv, the tired but happy children, two boys and three girls, aged seven to 16, clung to their young mother in a Willowdale condo donated by an anonymous Jewish benefactor.

CANADA

Restitution Reminder

TORONTO — The United Restitution Organization (URO) is reminding Canadians that both Volkswagen and Siemens have established humanitarian relief funds for former forced laborers. As well, URO is reminding Holocaust survivors that claims for labor performed in the Lodz ghetto are still being processed. For information, call 416-630-2920. In Montreal, call URO at 514-931-7933.

Canada To Watch PA Aid

OTTAWA — Canada says it will keep a close watch on the $92 million in aid it has pledged to the Palestinian Authority (PA). The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) says its has several auditing and monitoring controls in place to ensure the funds are used effectively. Canada's commitment came soon after Britain complained that millions of dollars earmarked for low-cost housing had been squandered by the PA.

Ronen Wins Grit Nod

TORONTO — Dan Ronen, who has advised federal cabinet minister Art Eggleton on Jewish matters and is the brother of Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen, recently won the provincial Liberal nomination in Thornhill riding. Ronen, a lawyer, defeated his rivals on the first ballot. The riding won't exist until the next election. It will have one of the highest concentration of Jewish voters of any electoral district in the country.

ISRAEL

Orthodox Boycott Meet

HAIFA — Orthodox representatives boycotted a meeting last week of the Haifa religious council. The meeting was cancelled when only representatives from the Reform and Conservative movements showed up. Earlier this month, Israel's Supreme Court ordered the council to allow the participation of non-Orthodox representatives.

Army Harassment Up

JERUSALEM — The number of sexual harassment complaints filed in the Israeli army rose last year by 43 percent, according to the head of the Israel Defence Force's Women's Corps. Brig.-Gen. Orit Adeto told a Knesset committee that 23 sexual harassment charges were filed in 1998, compared to 15 the previous year. According to the army, about half of the instances of sexual harassment in the IDF involve commanders.

WORLD

Insurance Settlement

ROME — Italy's largest insurance company has begun compensating heirs of policyholders who perished in the Holocaust. Some 1,551 applicants filed for payment from the $12-million Israel-based fund established by Assicurazioni Generali. Applicants may still seek payment from the fund, which is also making payments to needy survivors and organizations dedicated to commemorating the Holocaust.

Getting Kids To Camp

NEW YORK — A new foundation aims to triple the percentage of North American Jewish children who attend Jewish summer camp. The Foundation for Jewish Camping, which plans to announce its first grants this spring, is touting the effort as a way to ensure Jewish continuity. Some 30,000 Jewish children in the United States and Canada, or four percent of all Jewish kids in North America, currently attend Jewish summer camp, according to the foundation.

Senators Urge Clinton

WASHINGTON — Sixty U.S. senators have urged President Bill Clinton to keep Jonathan Pollard imprisoned despite pressure from Israel to free the convicted spy for the Jewish state. "Any grant of clemency would now be viewed as an acquiescence to external political pressures," the senators wrote in a letter to Clinton.

Israelis Deny Charges

NICOSIA — Two Israeli Mossad agents denied the spying charges brought against them as their trial began in Cyprus. The two were in possession of listening devices when they were arrested several months ago at a fishing village near the site of a Cypriot military installation. The incident marred relations between Cyprus and Israel, which has repeatedly said the two were not spying.

Poland Marks 'Day of Judaism'

WARSAW — Poland has marked its second annual "Day of Judaism." As part of the event designed to foster interfaith dialogue and education, a number of Polish churches included the day's theme in their services, and one million postcards bearing a photograph of Pope John Paul II together with Rome's Chief Rabbi Elio Toaff were distributed in all the country's parishes.

The cards of the pontiff and the chief rabbi bore a special prayer written for the occasion by the Pope, who met with Rabbi Toaff during a historic visit to Rome's main synagogue in 1986.

"Support the Jewish people so that they can experience respect and love," the prayer read.

This year's Day of Judaism took place amid continuing tension over the erection of hundreds of crosses at the site of the Auschwitz death camp by militant Catholics defying the orders of both the Church and the Polish government.

Despite the tension over the crosses, leaders of Poland's Jewish community attended a Roman Catholic mass in the city of Wroclaw, and Catholic faithful there attended Jewish services.

Pardes Shalom undergoes major expansion

Cemetery will have enough plots for 75 years

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Community officials are slated to close the $4 million purchase of a site for the largest Jewish cemetery in the Toronto area on Feb. 1.

Next week's closing ends a long process to expand Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park, also known as Pardes Shalom. The community's purchase of 200 acres of rural properties and farmland in York Region will mean an additional 70,000 to 90,000 burial plots, enough, officials say, for 75 years.

The cemetery is planned for an area about a mile north of the existing Pardes Shalom cemetery. It will be located between Bathurst and Dufferin streets, south of King-Vaughan Road in northern Vaughan.

Municipal and regional zoning approval finally came late last year, but with some limitations. About a third of the property will not be used for burials. A wooded section and some wetlands designated an area of natural and scientific interest, will be set aside for environmental reasons.

As well, access will only be from Bathurst. Access from Dufferin was denied as a result of traffic bylaws and objections from area residents. Pardes Shalom has also provided assurances to a local farmer that the cemetery will not pollute his wells.

The site won't be used for at least 10 years, according to Pardes Shalom's executive director, Ben Schneider. In the interim, it will be leased for farm use.

Schneider said about half the current cemetery's 36,000 plots have been used or allocated. And a recent report by York Region's planning committee said Pardes Shalom has experienced an average annual increase in burials of 16 percent.

Schneider said the cemetery currently conducts about 500 burials a year. Officials believe it will be full by 2020.

The York Region study cited statistics showing that over 15 percent of the Toronto area's Jewish population is 65 and older – five percent higher than in the general community. And from 1981 to 1991, the number of Jewish seniors jumped by 35 percent, to 25,000.

It added that the Jewish community in and around Toronto is expected "to grow at a rapid rate."

Pardes Shalom was opened in 1977 and has become the Jewish community's major cemetery. A total of 53 organizations, synagogues and fraternal groups have sections in it. It also conducts burials for the unaffiliated.

Plans for the new cemetery include an administrative building and a chapel.

The $4 million purchase of lands was made by a private family.

Levin maintains fight for Jewish school funding

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the past several months Wayne Levin has been working overtime to mobilize opinion in the Jewish community to back efforts to obtain government funds for Jewish day schools.

Although he and a grass-roots network of volunteers, called Parents for Educational Choice (PEC), have managed to get several thousand signatures on a petition, overcoming widespread skepticism has been his most difficult task.

Many in the Jewish community believe the Supreme Court of Canada has nullified efforts to broaden government funding to include Jewish and Protestant religious schools. That is simply not the case, he says.

While the Supreme Court of Canada ruled the equality and freedom of religion provisions of the Writing, inquiry imagination and text are as deeply embedded into our essential spiritual natures as are air and water into our physical natures. Our nurturing as sentient, thinking, creative, curious human beings derives very much from the fact that for 350,000 years, our eyes have been drawn at one and the same time, both to the high, soaring heights of a craggy, desert mountain and to the constantly renewing, impenetrable depths of the pages of our sacred books.

After that first trembling moment when the oral tradition was transcribed with a loving, steady hand onto "paper," Jews have never stopped writing, and reading.

The Canadian Jewish News attaches great significance to encouraging and to fostering new "Jewish" writing.

Thus, for example, we publish an annual Passover literary supplement of readers' original prose and poetry. From time to time, on our Perspectives page, we also publish short works of prose. In our weekly space reserved for guest voices, we occasionally publish poetry.

But we always try to highlight for our readers important ongoing developments in modern "Jewish" writing.

The most recent important development in modern "Jewish" writing is the appearance of the seventh annual edition of Parchment.

Parchment is an independent journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing located at the Centre for Jewish Studies of York University. Indeed it is the only journal of Jewish Canadian creative writing.

Its editor is Adam Fuerstenberg. He took over the editorship of the journal three years ago from its founding editor Shel Krakofsky, and he is stewarding Parchment to impressive new levels of achievement. The 1998-99 issue is almost a third larger than previous issues and more and more writers are sending material to its pages. This year the works of 25 different authors, some appearing for the first time, and one uniquely talented translator appear in the journal. By comparison, 19 authors were published last year.

Like previous issues, this year's Parchment offers readers a rich anthology of worthwhile reading, often entertaining, insightful and even inspirational.

Wisely, the balance between poetry and prose is evenly weighted, with sufficient, rewarding choices on either side for the reader.

A small sampling from two or three works may be representative of the issue's overall high quality.

The first entry is a short story by J.J. Steinfeld entitled Should the Word Hell Be Capitalized?

Steinfeld's writing has appeared before in Parchment. He has a deft, understated writing style that ably captures the intricacies and layering of relationships and moods. In this piece, he fuses the memories of a Prince Edward Island childhood with the pressing obligations of a present Toronto parenthood. He writes about the ultimate responsibilities of a child to his parents even as he tries to be the best parent possible to his child.

Gary Levine, also a previous Parchment author, poignantly describes the painful confusion of watching the decline of one's elderly parent in the short story Mr. Berkowitz at Home.

Levine is a master at combining humor with mildly prodding cynicism to record an insight into the human condition that aches as it penetrates our understanding. He effectively creates a prose structure that embodies the very melancholy of the prose message.

There is a special treat in this Parchment for readers who enjoy poetry.

In addition to the other generally finely written poems, the editor has generously provided three poems by Polish Nobel Laureate Wislawa Szymborska translated from the Polish by the award-winning Simcha Simchovitch, along with two poems by Simchovitch translated from the Yiddish by author, playwright Kenneth Sherman.

The following is one of the Szymborska poems:

Some Love Poetry

Some – that is not all.
Even not a majority of all
but a minority.
Not counting schools, where you have to,
and poets themselves,
there will be two such persons in a thousand.

They love – but one loves as well noodle soup, one loves compliments and the color of blue,
one loves an old scarf,
one loves to insist on his own,
one loves to pat a dog.

Poetry – only what is poetry?
Not one shaky answer was given to this question.
And I do not know, do not know and hold on to it like to a rescuing railing.

Parchment 1998-99 is a delightful read. It belongs in your home.

Pot-luck 'Peace Meal' brings religions together

VAUGHAN — Some 250 representatives of six religions gathered last week at a synagogue to learn tolerance and respect for one another.

The Mosaic Interfaith Group's annual pot-luck "Peace Meal" is held to coincide with Martin Luther King Jr. Day. It's an opportunity for members of the different religions to exchange information in an effort to further understanding.

The group consists of Jews, Christians, Buddhists, Hindus, Muslims and Zoroastrians, and was founded 19 years ago to foster interfaith harmony and respect while avoiding politics.

This year's annual Peace Meal took place at Temple Har Zion. Representatives from each faith spoke about their religious beliefs and customs, and then fielded questions from the audience.

Children, meantime, were in a separate room, where they drew pictures and talked about racism with the help of a moderator.

Later in the synagogue's sanctuary, eight separate choirs sang songs representing all the faiths. Members of the religions then did something almost all faiths have in common: blessing bread.

The Mosaic group was founded in 1980 by Temple Har Zion's Rabbi Michael Stroh and Rev. David Reeve of Thornhill United Church.

About 30 members meet four times a year in a different house of worship to learn about that religion.

The idea for the group, explained its chair, Arieh Cohen of Har Zion, sprang from a stretch of Bayview Avenue, north of Steeles, once known as "Little Jerusalem." In less than a kilometre, there's a Zoroastrian congregation, a Chinese Buddhist temple, the Jaffari Islamic Centre and the synagogue. There are also several Catholic and Protestant churches nearby.

"It's the best way to learn and to understand," said Cohen.

Roving congregation marks 25th

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Congregation Beth Haminyan, founded by members of Beth Tzedec Congregation, will celebrate its 25th anniversary Feb. 6.

Now in its fifth location at the gym in West Prep elementary school in Forest Hill, Congregation Beth Haminyan was also known as the Cedarvale Minyan because one of its first locations was in Cedarvale.

The congregation, which has no rabbi or cantor, has 91 families as members, half of them under 50 years of age.

"We are basically Orthodox in content," said president Joel Shupac, although the congregation is not affiliated with any Orthodox, Conservative or Reform body.

However, the congregation has parallel egalitarian services once every two months in a separate room where men and women share the ritual duties equally.

The philosophy of members tends to be on the Conservative side, Shupac told The CJN, but there is no English in the services, which are led by members who take turns reading the Torah and delivering divrei Torah.

There is an "air barrier" separating men and women at Congregation Beth Haminyan, he said, but no mechitzah. An equal amount of floor space is accorded men and women.

Despite the large number of families moving north to Thornhill and beyond, former president Elaine Posluns thinks the congregation will continue to exist, or even to grow.

"I hear about young families moving into smaller houses in the older Jewish areas," said Posluns. Though some members live far away, most live within reasonable distance of the congregation's current location.

"We enjoy an intimate environment, with lots of ruach (spirit)," said Shupac, a developer in private life. "We think we've managed to take the best of the Orthodox and Conservative traditions and combine them."

Posluns is enthusiastic about the 20 children who attend services regularly, and as the junior congregational choir, sing Adon Alom at the end of services, which are held Shabbat morning only.

The parallel egalitarian services began four years ago.

Though she was not a founding member, Posluns said when looking for a synagogue to attend, she was discouraged by the number of synagogues which only had elderly men participating, and she welcomed the existence of Congregation Beth Haminyan. She was also among those promoting the parallel services.

The anniversary will be celebrated at King Solomon's Table restaurant, by invitation to members and former members. It will also be marked by a CD-Rom of Hebrew melodies chanted by members.

Family reunion an emotional affair

Like nearly all Rwandans today, Mbabazi's story is tragic. Her husband, parents and almost all her relatives were victims of the 1994 killing spree, in which an estimated 300,000 children were murdered. Apart from her and the children, just three relatives survived the carnage. It's something she hasn't yet come to terms with.

"I don't know how to explain," she whispers, choking on her words.

She fled Kigali, Rwanda's capital, 18 months ago, leaving her kids in the care of a friend. "I had to go to protect them," she explains. "I had to go where things are possible for the sake of the children. It was very hard."

She chose Canada "because I needed a place with a humanitarian basis," and was granted refugee status. She's now a permanent resident.

Last November, Mbabazi contacted Carole Ann Reed, educational director of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre. Mbabazi knew of the centre because it had initiated a dialogue – still ongoing – between Holocaust survivors and the 100 or so Rwandans in Toronto who had survived their country's genocide.

Reed put her in touch with Adelman, who as founder of York University's Centre for Refugee Studies, knows the ins and outs of immigration. He pulled some strings with the federal government.

By this time, the friend who had been caring for Mbabazi's children, had taken them to Nairobi because she was having her own problems. The kids were left in a boys' orphanage but were taken in by a generous teacher who contacted the Canadian high commission in Nairobi.

Most of the paperwork was done over the Christmas break. The foreign affairs department and the high commission expedited medical exams, visas and travel documents.

Stanley Morais, head of sales and marketing for El Al's western Canadian operations, worked in tandem with the airline's Nairobi office, and got the children plane tickets to Toronto, via Tel Aviv, at greatly reduced fares.

And Ve'ahavta, which is involved in a myriad of humanitarian projects both here and overseas, facilitated funding, volunteers and clothes for the kids.

As Adelman put it, "everyone did a great job."

And now that one chapter has ended, another is starting, Mbabazi says.

The children, who are also permanent residents, will soon start school and begin learning English. Mbabazi, who has training in counselling and law, is looking for a job. Her plans, she laughs, are "to live in Canada and be successful."

A devout Pentecostal Christian, Mbabazi is asked to reflect on her plight. "Everyone is affected by genocide," she responds. "And God uses many people when it comes to rescue."

Romanian author gives book to library

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ariel Koprov, an 86-year-old Romanian-born author now living in Toronto, has presented a gift of his book, Jewish Life in Bessarabia, to the Jewish Public Library.

The book is an English translation of Tzvishin Tzvey Velt Milchomos (Between Two World Wars), which he originally wrote in Yiddish.

The prolific author, who writes in four languages, Yiddish, Hebrew, Romanian and Russian, settled in Toronto 15 years ago with his family, after they had lived in Israel for 10 years.

In Israel he published two books about Kopreszt, the city of his birth, and Teleneszi, where he lived as an adult.

Koprov said he developed a desire to write at an early age. In 1941, he had finished his first book of 560 pages, but the book did not appear in printed form because it was destroyed during a pogrom by Moldavian fascists.

In 1941, when Nazi Germany attacked the U.S.S.R., Koprov, together with a group of his friends, voluntarily joined the Red Army. He received medals and was distinguished for his bravery on the front.

After the war, he returned to his home and continued his studies at the Moscow University, graduating with a diploma. He said he was given a high position in government, but never joined the Communist party.

He has two daughters living in Toronto, Miriam Greenberg and Ariah Gulkin, four grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

Activist named honorary consul

TORONTO — Alan Simons, a Toronto Jewish activist, has been named Rwanda's honorary consul general in Ontario.

At the same time, Simons' daughter Melanie is studying the similarities between the Holocaust and the genocide in Rwanda, following her recent visit to the African nation.

Alan Simons, who served on the former Holocaust Remembrance Committee, says his appointment to the mainly ceremonial position is appropriate, given the special relationship that has developed between Rwandans and Jews.

Last year, the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre began a dialogue with some members of Toronto's 300-family Rwandan community about how to memorialize the victims of Rwanda's bloodbath and how its survivors can learn from Jews to open up and talk about the terror.

"How could you not get involved?" asks Simons, a 58-year-old executive, "when you see that 300,000 children were murdered and 400,000 were orphaned? How can one not get involved as a Jew?"

Simons got the post through his contacts in the Rwandan expatriate community. Last spring, Rwanda's government asked him to escort Séraphine Bizimungu, the wife of the country's president, through the Holocaust centre and its museum.

He won't be able to use the title in any official capacity. As honorary consul, he'll do some work with Rwanda's embassy in Ottawa, but mostly, he'll facilitate fundraising and plans for a memorial, and try to get Holocaust survivors involved. As he puts it, "It's honorary, but it's an honor."

It's estimated that about 100 Rwandans in Toronto are survivors of the 1994 genocide of roughly 1.5 million Tutsi and moderate Hutus.

"They're looking for guidance on how to express themselves," Simons explains. "But it's still too early for many of them."

Simons will also take part in this spring's third annual fundraiser walk in High Park for the Hope for Rwanda's Children Fund, a registered charity that raises money for the country's orphans. In July, he'll travel to Kigali, the Rwandan capital, for the Walk for Hope in Rwanda.

His daughter, meantime, is doing undergraduate work at the University of Toronto on the Rwandan genocide and its similarities to the Holocaust.

Melanie Simons, 26, who spent a month in Rwanda, says she encountered a "traumatized" country.

For one thing, most of the extremist Hutus who committed the killings are still at large, and the nation's shattered infrastructure can barely cope with prosecutions or with easing the plight of survivors, she says.

Bones and remains of bodies are being found every day, she says. "Children especially have been desensitized."

She started her involvement in 1994, when she helped raise $10,000 in emergency relief for Rwanda in a giant barbecue and garage sale.

But despite the trauma in Rwanda, she encountered a lot of optimism, as well as one overriding sentiment: "I heard from many people that 'it's only the Jews who understand us. It's only the Jews who help us.' They feel a real affinity to Jews."

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As he viewed a slide presentation of the Kowno Ghetto during a visit to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, Elly Gotz was surprised to recognize his old school.

Elly Gotz today.

When he saw the next two slides, he exclaimed, "That was my lathe," and then, "That's me and my students."

A survivor of the Kowno ghetto and concentration camp in Lithuania and of the camp in Dachau, Gotz told The CJN he remembers when George Kadish took the pictures, which could have cost Kadish his life.

Kadish, who lived in Kowno, worked for the German authorities in an X-ray lab outside the ghetto, where he had access to film and the equipment to develop his pictures.

Elly Gotz (centre), then a 16-year-old instructor, is seen in a secret photo taken by George Kadish in the Kowno Ghetto in 1944.

Gotz remembers when Kadish walked into the room where Gotz, then 16, was teaching metalwork and locksmithing. Kadish opened his coat, where he had hidden a camera, snapped some pictures in a few seconds, and quickly left.

Kadish, who escaped from Kowno in 1944, buried the film in metal crates in the ghetto. Later that year, when the ghetto was cleared and the surviving Jews were transported to Dachau, the Germans burned everything in the ghetto.

When the Russians arrived four weeks later, Kadish returned to the ghetto and secretly retrieved his films. He began sending his films to a kibbutz in Israel, where he later settled. In 1956, an Egyptian shell destroyed the building, and most of the film was destroyed.

The remaining film was later presented to the Holocaust Museum in Washington.

Born and raised in Kowno, Gotz was 13 in 1941 when he entered the ghetto. The ORT school's teachers built equipment there and taught the younger children trades; there was no other schooling. Gotz was first a student and later an instructor.

Looking at the picture, a copy of which he obtained from the Holocaust museum, Gotz said, "I loved teaching metalwork and toolmaking, [but] most of my students perished."

At Dachau, he explained, they needed technical people. "We were put to work building a giant subterranean factory for aircraft. It was a 12-hour work day and a hunger diet. Every day more people were dying of beatings, hunger and disease."

He says that working indoors saved his life and enabled him to get a job for his father. His mother was a surgical nurse.

"We all miraculously survived," he said.

After the war, Gotz, who is an electronics engineer, lived in Germany, Norway, Rhodesia and South Africa. He came to Canada in 1964 with his wife Esme and their three children.

In Toronto, he was a director of a Canadian plastics company and later managed several manufacturing businesses. Seven years ago, he became a director of the Toronto School of Business in Oshawa, Pickering and Cobourg.

"This is the only picture I have of the war years," he says. "The picture brought back my memories of being a teenager, which was very different from my children's teenage years. Life in Canada is wonderful, and I'm grateful that our children grew up in this wonderful land."

Canada should speak

Poll after poll among both Israelis and Palestinians indicate that the majority of the two peoples still earnestly want the peace process to go forward. Of course there are profound differences between the two peoples regarding virtually every aspect of that process, in terms of its methods and its outcome. But it is nevertheless correct to say that the momentum of the current state of Israeli-Palestinian coexistence, as shaky as it is, inclines more to peace than to war.

In light of that majority inclination, it is very disappointing and disturbing that media analyst and political researcher David Bedein could find not even one example of materials or lessons within the Palestinian educational curriculum that promote peace with Israel.

Bedein goes even further. Not only was peaceful coexistence not being taught in the schools to young Palestinians in the self-rule areas, he told The CJN, but the curriculum actually displays "an attitude towards the inspiration of war."

If Yasser Arafat will not actively preach and practise peace towards the people of Israel, if he continues to ignore the entreaties of the Israeli government to prove his bona fides with deeds, then western governments should step in to forcefully make the case that a curriculum of war is intolerable and totally at odds with the promises and signed commitments he made to them and to Israel.

The government of Canada can and should play a role in raising the matter with him. Canadian funds may not be flowing toward the establishment of Palestinian school curricula, as Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) spokesperson Michelle Velleux advised The CJN, but Canadian funds are indeed flowing toward the establishment of a viable Palestinian economy.

It is quite appropriate for Canadian funds to be used to help prop up a Palestinian economy struggling to become self-sufficient. But it is absolutely inappropriate for those funds to be used to undermine the security of the Jewish state.

Canada, therefore, has both an economic interest and a moral obligation to speak out. We are listening.

Falwell's folly

The pages of The CJN have recently carried a number of stories and commentaries about the increase in some church activities, here and abroad, aimed at ushering in the next millennium by "co-opting" the Jews in one form or another. Whether the activities entailed proselytizing on the streets of Toronto or wreaking violent havoc on the streets of Jerusalem, the first targets are the Jews.

Now we read a report filed by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency out of New York of a different kind of Jewish "co-option."

Rev. Jerry Falwell has alerted his followers that the prelude to the Second Coming, within merely a decade, of the Christian messiah, will be the widespread of universal evil by an Antichrist who must "of course" be Jewish.

Falwell has a very large flock. His pronouncements are received by them, literally, as gospel.

We should be alarmed. These misguided, misinformed teachings are dangerous and contain within them the seeds of an outcropping of violence against Jews.

The leaders of the American Jewish establishment reacted swiftly and firmly to the reverend's foolish remarks. They branded his preachings for what they were: "anti-Semitism at best and anti-Semitic at worst," according to Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

But where are the voices of the Church leaders, whose words would have the greatest influence in setting the record straight?

Against barring non-Orthodox Jews from councils

On behalf of the 6,000 members of ARZA Canada, we recently wrote to David Sultan, the Israel ambassador to Canada, to express our distress at the passage of the first reading of the Religious Councils Bill, intended to bar non-Orthodox Jews from serving on religious councils. The bill violates the integrity of municipalities and regions to make their own decisions, as well as the spirit of religious tolerance enshrined in Israel's Declaration of Independence.

One cannot fault the minority Orthodox parties for acting in their own self-interest to attempt to preserve their monopoly over the definitions of Jewish religious practice and thought, even if such a stand is completely in violation of the democratic ideals upon which the Jewish state was created. It is unconscionable, however, for other members of Knesset to sacrifice these ideals for short-term political gain. We therefore urge you to communicate to the government our urgent wishes that they oppose any further action on this bill.

ARZA Canada, as the Zionist organization of the Reform Jewish movement in Canada, will continue in its ardent support of and commitment to the State of Israel, regardless of the outcome on this bill. We are also confident in the good sense and moral values of the people of Israel, such that passage of the Religious Councils Bill – or a revival of the notorious Conversion Bill – would only be a temporary setback in the development of a healthy non-Orthodox religious community in Israel. These actions, however, do have consequences. We can assure you that if these bills were to pass, the relationship between their supporters and their parties in the Knesset and the overwhelming majority of Jews in the Diaspora would irrevocably change.

All Jewish funerals went ahead, despite storm

Recently, Toronto was hit by storm after storm, bringing the entire city to a virtual standstill. The staff of the six Jewish cemeteries valiantly continue their job without interruption.

The Jewish community owes a debt of gratitude to the cemetery workers, who worked under these most extreme and miserable conditions. No Jewish funeral was either cancelled or delayed.

Clarifies views on spousal abuse

My interest in the question of spousal abuse, as dealt with in several recent issues of The CJN, lies in the Jewish concept of shalom bayit, peace and harmony in the home. When a married couple fail to achieve this, total war often ensues, and as I pointed out in an earlier letter, both partners have their own deadly weapons. One gender is not always totally to blame.

This invited Leslie Lutsky's response (CJN, Dec. 17). He chose to use my request for impartial understanding in marital breakdown to redirect the topic into criminal assaults against women. He supported his facts with alarming statistics drawn from the general population across the country. I suspect that, per capita, there are comparatively few Jewish rapists and Jewish murderers in Canadian jails.

Leslie Lutsky further implies that "every male" carries within him the seed of hostility towards women. This proposition of collective guilt would have to be examined by a professional analyst with extensive clinical experience.

However, the plight of women criminally attacked, as he strongly states, deserves society's serious attention and everyone's support.

UJPO protests anti-Semitism in Russia

In a letter to Prime Minister Yevgeni Primakov, we wrote that we are disturbed by newspaper reports of growing manifestations of anti-Semitism in the Russian republic during the past number of months, including a bomb attack against a synagogue in Moscow last spring, the appearance of swastika-wearing neo-Nazis at Moscow underground stations, and the expression of violent threats against Jews by a "Communist" deputy, General Makashov in the Duma. Evidently, a motion of censure against his remarks was voted down by your parliament.

The statements by Makashov are reminiscent of the frightful era of the phony "Doctors' Plot" and the crimes against leading Jewish intellectuals in the last years of Stalin's life. We hope and trust that progressive politicians like you and others will do your utmost to curb the dangerous trend of renewed anti-Semitism from whichever quarter it appears. As has happened historically, this kind of racist incitement feeds on fear and insecurity and scapegoats selected ethnic groups, instead of tackling the real roots of discontent.

Military cemeteries throughout the Russian Republic, in Ukraine and other former republics of the U.S.S.R., bear witness to the large numbers of Jewish men and women who, together with other nationalities, laid down their lives in the heroic struggle against fascism. We urge you to do your utmost so that their immense sacrifice will not have been in vain.

Perspectives

A problematic form of 'reconciliation'

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Most Jews feel that we have many legitimate historical grievances against the past treatment by the Church.

Many have been impressed and even pleasantly surprised by some of the steps taken by the Catholic Church in the last few years in its attempt to effect reconciliation with Jews and Judaism.

We carefully watch developments inside the Church with an eye to determining whether a new spirit really does exist there today.

In this context, was the recent decision to canonize Edith Stein a useful step towards rapprochement between Jews and Catholics?

As Jews we have no business telling the Catholic Church whom they should and should not canonize. But when we read newspaper reports suggesting that the canonization was part of the Vatican's efforts at reconciliation with Jews, we are perplexed.

Stein was born Jewish. After a period of years in which she considered herself an atheist, she converted to Catholicism. She became a nun and was eventually killed in the Shoah as a Jew.

The Catholic Church's recent decision to canonize her, i.e. to declare her to be a saint was not, at least in theory, connected to her Jewishness. Nor was it a result of her dying the death of a martyr.

A person is declared to be a saint in the Catholic Church only if it can be proven to the Church's satisfaction, that he or she performed some miracle.

A Church body investigated the claim made by an American couple that their sick baby was saved from death because of the miraculous intercession of Stein (to whom the couple prayed many years after her death). The Church was satisfied that a miracle had occurred and therefore felt that it was appropriate to canonize her.

Many Jewish writers commented negatively on this canonization, arguing that the Church was attempting on some level to Christianize the Holocaust, and was ignoring the fact that the grand majority of Jewish Holocaust victims were Jews who had not become Catholics.

To my mind, that aspect of the issue should not trouble us. If Catholics begin to pay more attention to the plight of Stein and other Catholics killed in the Shoah, it is possible that they will also pay more attention to the sufferings of our people.

What is more disconcerting is the rhetoric that surrounded this canonization. The Pope was quoted as having referred to Stein as a "great daughter of Israel."

Additionally, many newspaper reports characterized Stein's canonization as yet another example of the Church's new spirit of rapprochement with Judaism.

To understand why such assertions are disturbing, let us compare the story of Stein, the convert/apostate, to that of another convert/apostate, a man named Bodo.

He was descended from a noble family and served as deacon in the palace of Louis the Pious in France in 838. Bodo courageously risked his life by sneaking away from France to Spain where he was able to begin practicing the religion that he truly had come to believe in – Judaism. There he changed his name to Eleazar and wrote copiously in defence of his new religious beliefs.

If Catholics wish to understand how we Jews left when we heard that Stein was canonized, they should consider how they would feel if they heard that Jews had set up a new holiday to commemorate the life and works of the "apostate" Bodo-Eleazar.

Many Catholics might not have a problem with a Jewish decision to give new honors to Bodo-Eleazar. But thinking Catholics would laugh if anyone suggested to them that the Jewish decision to honor him should be seen as an attempt at reconciliation with Catholicism.

The comparison, to be sure, is imperfect. Even after her conversion to Christianity, Stein considered herself to be, in some sense, part of the Jewish people, and she was killed by the Nazis for that reason.

But I fear that many Catholics do not understand how offended most Jews are by her belief that she could be a nun and still be, in some sense, Jewish.

Perhaps the one and only aspect of the definition of "what is a Jew" that all Jewish groups currently agree on is that a Jew is someone who does not believe in another religion.

Here in North America that generally means that a Jew is someone who does not believe in the divinity and messiahship of Jesus.

For 2,000 years Christian and Jewish-Christian groups have been attempting to erode that consensus and to argue that Judaism is consistent with belief in Jesus.

Such attempts to challenge the right of Judaism to define itself continue. A recent (Dec. 21) full-page ad in the Globe and Mail asserted in very large letters, "Is it reasonable to be Jewish and believe in Jesus? We think so!"

It is crucial though that the Jewish community not abandon its hitherto united stance that the acceptance of Christianity represents an irreparable break with Judaism.

Many arguments can be cited for that position, but the most obvious one is the pragmatic one: once Jewish-Christianity becomes, God forbid, an acceptable form of Jewish identity, how long will it take for Jewish assimilation rates in North America to skyrocket to as yet undreamed of levels?

Stein was certainly a courageous woman who died for what she believed in. But Jews and Catholics must recognize that she pursued a path in her spiritual quest that is not consistent with Judaism.

When we hear that Stein was canonized we should not say to ourselves that the Church is reaching out to Jews in some new way.

Perhaps the canonization should best be seen as unrelated to any question of her Jewishness, and simply as a function of the Church recognizing a miracle story.

But if the canonization is related to Stein's Jewishness, then there is nothing new at all about this story and there is no new style of "reaching out" to Jews in the Church's decision.

A major problem for Judaism for most of the last two millennia has been the "reaching out" of the Church, at times aggressively, in an attempt to get Jews to cease practicing Judaism.

We are told that that is no longer the case. And then we see the Church conferring great honors upon a Jew who became a Christian and we are told how that reflects the new spirit of reconciliation within the Church.

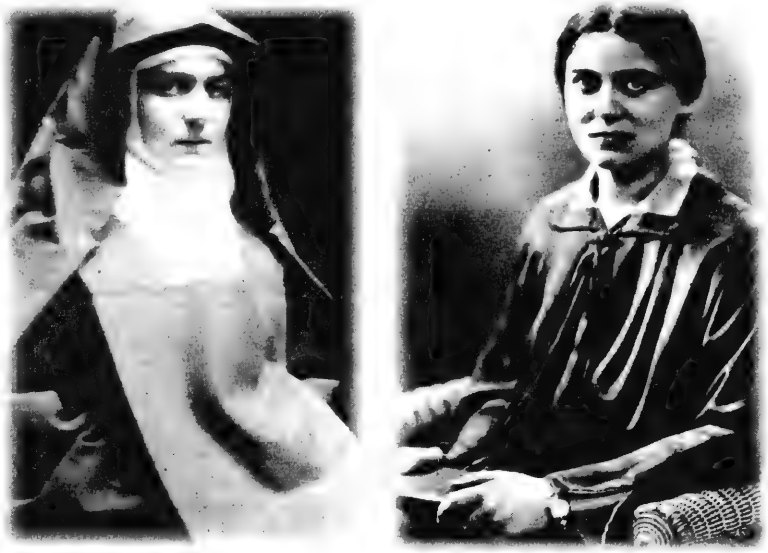
There is a strong temptation for Jews to say to themselves that the Church is delivering to us the same message that it delivered for most of the last 2,000 years: "We will show all love and honor to you Jews, as long as you cease practicing Judaism."

Let us not allow other religious groups to define for us what a Jew is. If Catholics wish to argue that Stein is their hero, that is certainly their right.

And while we may feel impressed by her courage, we must continue to say clearly that she chose not to be one of us.

Her canonization is, at best, to be divorced from the fact that she thought of herself as, to some degree, Jewish.

At worst, it should be seen as a step backwards, towards an outmoded and old-fashioned conversion approach to Jews and Judaism.



Edith Stein, in habit and plain clothes. [RNS/Reuters]

Opinions

An ugly, fraternal argument

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It's ugly, very, very ugly. Once again the so-called religious parties in Israel have gone into attack mode, defaming Jews both inside and outside Israel, seeking to strip Conservative and Reform rabbis of their title, and branding Jews who attach themselves to Reform and Conservative congregation as heretics.

Not since the wars of the mitnagdim against the nascent chassidic movement have such ugly words been spoken. Then it was the Gaon of Vilna who led the attack against the chassidic movement, which he considered heretical because of its approach to Judaism. Will we never learn?

Chassidism, whatever its faults (and they are many, including their joining with other ultras to delegitimize most of world Jewry) was not a heresy and has contributed incredibly profound insights into the nature of Jewish spirituality. But the ultras of Israel seem to be blithely unaware of the last outcome of such a fraternal argument – both chassidim and mitnagdim continue to exist side by side. And clearly they have no grasp of what happened the last time a real war between the Jews broke out.

Let me remind you.

The last time a war broke out between the Jews it lasted nearly a century, beginning with the rebellions against Rome that preceded the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, and lasting until the slaughter of Bar Kochva and his troops in 132 CE. The Temple lay in ruins, Jews began a long, slow dispersion from the land of Israel and rabbinic Judaism had to begin the task of reconstruction.

Jews today are not the descendants of the zealots who died on Masada, or of the ordinary Jews and rabbis, like Rabbi Akiva, who saw Bar Kochva as their messiah. We are descended from the rabbinic mode that sought to live in peace with the secular world and with each other. We are the heirs of a tradition of dialogue and disputation, to be sure, but a disputation that seeks to draw us closer to the best we can be as human beings, not a gut-wrenching slanging match. There is no doubt that zealotry is an evil which has plagued us, but now to see it return in the parliament of the Jewish state, is disgusting.

And dangerous. One story from a religious friend. The bus was crowded with all kinds of Jews, black-hatted and bare-headed. The last to get on was haredi, and he asked those standing to move back. A bare-headed man half-way back responded, "The day you serve in the army is the day I'll make room for you on a bus." Within seconds most passengers were at each other's throats.

To see this dissension echoed in North American forums is even more frightening. It terrifies me to read in the New York Times letters from North American Orthodox Jews that we, the majority of North American Jews, are outside the pale. If it were not so ominous, it would almost be funny.

One of the favorite metaphors seems to be sports. It goes something like this: Sport has rules, and if you want to play baseball/football/basketball, you have to be inside the lines, playing by the rules. Otherwise you are out. You are playing some other game, but it isn't the one on the field.

Sport is not a metaphor for Judaism or any religion. Sports figures are elitist, overpaid, often violent on and off the field, and as individuals certainly are not the role models I would choose for my children. And rules unchangeable? No, they are not. They are certainly not Torah from Sinai, as any real fan will tell you. But whatever the case, I reject the sports analogy completely. And I wonder how the Reform rabbi I first heard use this analogy feels today, as he is "benched" by the Chief Rabbinate of Israel.

No, Judaism defies such glib analogies. It is not a contest, it is not a sport. It is a thriving universe of thought and argument, of insight into our most private fears and hopes, a river of ideas that is fed from many streams, each adding to the rush of waters.

And the arguments in the Israeli parliament hold no attraction for me; nor do they fill me with the kind of strength I seek from my religion. They are nothing but crass, political manoeuvres meant to wring more money out of the state (for which most of the constituents refuse to fight), to enlarge the power base of individuals who can teach no insights of Torah since they are blinded by hatred, and to defame and devalue other Jews whom they probably have never met in honest dialogue.

Ugly, very ugly. By the way, in the end, who won the wars between the Jews? The other guy.

Jewish input on protection of fetus needed

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Last month, the Supreme Court of Canada heard arguments on a very difficult question: Can a child sue his mother for prenatal injuries caused by the mother's negligent operation of a motor vehicle?

The settled law in Canada is that a child – once born alive – may sue a third party for prenatal injuries caused by the third party's negligence. But whether the child can sue his or her mother for the mother's negligence during pregnancy presents the Court with a novel question and a complex one, for it ultimately involves the question of whether a pregnant woman owes a duty to the fetus she is carrying. (This explains the eagerness of anti-abortion and pro-choice groups to enter the case as intervenants.)

During the course of the hearing, Chief Justice Antonio Lamer cautioned that the Court might be usurping the role of the legislators with its decision. As reported in MacLean's, he said: "It's a legislature undertaking that is difficult for a court to do."

The latter is a familiar refrain in cases involving the protection of the fetus. In a 1997 case involving a young pregnant woman addicted to glue sniffing, the Supreme Court was asked to uphold an order which compelled the woman to "reside at a place of safety" and to "refrain from further consumption of drugs or other intoxicating substances until the birth of the child." The Court refused to uphold the order. The Court would not extend the common law jurisdiction of the courts, even to protect the fetus from the undeniably harmful effects of fetal alcohol syndrome.

On more than 20 occasions in its judgment, the Court stated that the matter was, more appropriately, one for the legislature rather than the courts. Even in the Morgentaler case, it was never suggested that the fetus be absolutely without rights throughout the entire pregnancy. In fact, Morgentaler is seen as providing the maximum opportunity for legislative decision-making. In another famous case, Tremblay v. Daigle, the Court suggested that the fetus could be treated as a person in order to protect its interest after it is born. The upshot of these cases is that the fetus should be provided with some protections during the pregnancy, but it is up to Parliament to define what those protections should be and when they should arise. Perhaps, some lessons can be learned from Halachah.

It is my view that Canadians are essentially balancers. When confronted with the conflict between the rights of the woman and the protection of the fetus, Canadians want to balance those interests. The position of the unborn child in the Talmud provides an interesting example of balancing. If the life or health of the mother is in danger, the mother takes precedence over her unborn child, for the unborn child does not have the status of a person in talmudic law.

Thus, abortion for the purpose of safeguarding the life and health, physical or psychological, of the mother is permissible in Jewish law. Otherwise, however, the potential future life of the unborn child is worthy of protection. For example, one may desecrate the Shabbat to save an unborn child, even if there is only a potential for danger, or even if the life saving measures may prove fruitless.

Halachah, generally, places an emphasis on obligations as opposed to rights. It is the obligation of the mother (and the father as well) to safeguard the unborn child. Thus, lifestyle preferences which harm the unborn child would be a violation of the obligation to safeguard the fetus. It is also the obligation of others to ensure that the obligations of the parents towards the unborn child are being fulfilled.

One might argue that, based upon this analysis, Canadian law should provide that once the mother has decided, by action or inaction, to bring the unborn child to term and not to have an abortion, an obligation arises upon the mother (and the father) to protect the fetus from harm that will be manifested once the child is born.

Over the past decade or more, the organized Jewish community of Canada – usually through the auspices of the Canadian Jewish Congress – has been involved in many social justice issues: capital punishment, day care, gay rights and others. Perhaps, in accordance with the general spirit of Halachah, advocating a balanced approach to the protection of the fetus should be Congress' next task.

Parents or peers: who's more important?

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I am greatly indebted to Gordon Wolfe, executive director of the Jewish Family & Child Service of Toronto, who permitted me to use excerpts from an article he published recently. It appeared in the agency's publication Family Matters.

Wolfe outlines the fallout from a new book by Judith Rich Harris entitled, The Nurture Assumption: Why Children Turn Out The Way They Do.

Harris deals with the phenomenon that children who are brought up by loving and caring parents, and who are taught decent and thoughtful behavior towards others, occasionally turn out to act very differently. In such cases, their behavior is usually influenced by their peers: they have joined the wrong group, and its morals displace the parental nurture. That is the reason for the occasional terrible happenstance of which we read in the papers, that children from good homes commit crimes.

Harris draws the unpopular conclusion that "there is little evidence to support the idea that good parenting is responsible for the development of positive behavior, or conversely, that inadequate parenting produces problem offspring."

In response, Wolfe says there is no question that as children move through their adolescence, they begin to rebel against society and parental values, and seek acceptance and support from peer groups. However, it is also true that the less acceptance and support adolescents get at home, the more they will seek from their peer group.

Wolfe quotes child psychiatrist, Dr. Paul Steinhauer: "Although adolescents are influenced by their friends, deep down, the family's values are a core influence."

Wolfe believes that "many teenagers select precisely those friends whose values are congruent with those of their parents. But it would be erroneous to assume that either peer or parental values are all-embracing. In the large majority of families, the opinions of parents will be more salient on some issues, while those of peers will seem to be more relevant to a different set of problems, especially where the adolescent has no parental support on which to depend. The need to conform to pressures, whether they be from parents or peers, will vary. Personality, maturity, family relationships, as well as variables, all need to be considered."

Wolfe admits that Harris' book may help to widen our understanding of the role that the playground has in our children's lives, and pay more attention to the school yard, the role of teachers and the neighborhood, as well as other settings where children interact with their peers.

Harris may indeed have rendered an important service, in that she has called the family's attention to the friends their children acquire. The home should not assume that its values are automatically transferred to peer relations, but neither must parents believe that their teachings – and even more important, their example – have little influence on their offspring. Life is complex, and in this case it is both family and peers, home values and those of society, that help to shape a child's future.

The Kirshner File

Kay's fantasies capture world-wide audience

Once the stock-in-trade of lurid pulp magazines, fantasy has achieved a measure of respectability thanks in no small part to writers like J.R.R. Tolkien (The Lord of the Rings) and Frank Herbert (Dune).

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But of late, Guy Gavriel Kay, a Canadian who has become one of Canada's bestselling authors, has played an integral role in the process of de-stigmatizing the genre.

Kay, David Ketterer writes glowingly in Canadian Science Fiction and Fantasy (Indiana University Press), is "a storyteller of genius." Even allowing for hyperbole, Kay has certainly made an indelible impression where it really counts.

Translated into 14 major languages, his books have sold 1.2 million copies. And now his latest novel, Sailing to Sarantium (Penguin), his seventh since 1984, has recently been published.

Inspired by the reign of Justinian and Theodora in the Byzantine empire and the construction of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople, Sailing tells the tale of a Caius Crispus, a master craftsman who is caught between political battles and spiritual struggles.

Though Kay enjoys an international following, and is especially popular in Britain and Germany, his chief per-capita market is currently Canada.

"I can't complain of being a prophet without honor in my own country," he said the other afternoon in an interview. "I've been generously received here."

Kay, a former lawyer, is particularly grateful to Tolkien for having, almost single-handedly, created a huge market for fantasy.

"Fantasy is growing rapidly," he said. "It's no longer on the fringe. Look at Star Trek and the X-Files. They're in the dead centre of mainstream culture. Fantasy has the capacity to be as ambitious, as important and as thought-provoking as any form of fiction."

And in commercial terms, fantasy – and science fiction – are bestsellers in bookshops, he added.

The son of a surgeon and an artist, Kay, 43, was born in Weyburn, Sask., W.O. Mitchell's hometown. Mitchell set his novel, Who Has Seen the Wind, in Weyburn.

When he was two years old, his parents, Sam and Sybil, moved the family to Winnipeg's River Heights district. Kay was raised in a traditional Jewish home where books and learning were highly valued. As a child, he was an omnivorous reader and a natural writer. Though his reading tastes were eclectic, he was intrigued by myths, folklore and fairy tales, the pillars of fantasy.

At the University of Manitoba, he majored in English literature and philosophy, thinking he would teach or practise law. But midway through his studies, he was introduced to Tolkien's son, Christopher, by mutual friends.

Two years later, Tolkien asked Kay to spend a year in England helping him edit his father's final work. It was a remarkable opportunity which Kay gladly seized. "It crystallized in me an awareness that I wanted to write," he explained.

But urged on by his practical-minded father, Kay went east to study criminal law at the University of Toronto. However, he promised himself a sabbatical after his graduation. When he finally finished, Kay went off to Greece, to a fishing village, to write what turned out to be a much-praised but unpublished novel.

Back in Toronto after a year abroad, Kay entered Eddie Greenspan's law firm as an articling student. At the end of his first year there, he began to write The Summer Tree, the first volume of his trilogy, The Finovar Tapestry.

Kay submitted seven chapters to a British publisher and, much to his delight, the manuscript was accepted. After passing his bar admission test, Kay returned to Greece to complete this novel. His first editor, Linda McKnight, is now his agent.

By the age of 26, Kay turned his back on the law and began working as a consultant for CBC's acclaimed series, Scales of Justice. He remained with the show for about a decade as a writer, producer and director.

On average, he devoted seven to eight months of the season to Scales of Justice. The rest of the time, he worked on his books, conducting the research and the writing in Greece, France, Italy and New Zealand.

Today, due to family commitments, he writes exclusively in Toronto. He and his wife, Laura, a specialist in marketing for the performing arts, have two young children, Sam and Matthew.

Thanks to his success, Kay can afford the luxury of taking two to three years to write a novel. Apart from The Summer Tree and Sailing to Sarantium, his body of work consists of The Wandering Fire, The Darkest Road, Tigana (his breakthrough novel, he says), A Song for Arbonne and The Lions of Al-Rassan.

When the adrenaline is flowing, Kay writes approximately 1200 words a day. Although he plots out the theme and the characters in advance, he never knows where they will lead him. This uncertainty is a source of both stress and exhilaration. "I'd be bored if I knew the way a book was going," he said, subscribing to Graham Greene's famous dictum.

Kay is most at ease with the British style of fantasy, which requires a great deal of control and discipline.

"The perception that fantasy is written out of some amorphous, hazy daydream about dragons and elves is simply wrong."

Kay realizes that fantasy still has a credibility problem in some literary circles. Nevertheless, he is proud of his escapist fiction, a subject he likes to expound upon.

"Critics claim that fantasy hides from the real world. Yet the criticism ignores some obvious truths. All good storytelling is escapist in a very basic way. We are emotionally moved and intellectually engaged by what happens to the invented. This is true of all polished storytelling.

"In some ways, the journeys, quests and motifs of the best fantasy works can come closer to mirroring the inner journey of the human spirit than anything else. The patterns of myth, folklore and fairy tale that can be embedded in fantasy are ancient and immensely powerful.

"But fantasy is not just about magic and myths. It is also a way of dealing with history, with elements of the past, and this fascinates me."

Fantasy enables Kay to universalize a story. As he put it: "It takes incidents out of a very specific time and place and allows the author – and the reader – the possibility of seeing the themes, the elements of that story as applying to a wider range of times and places.

Guy Gavriel Kay

"It detaches a story from a narrow context and permits those aspects of it that engage the writer to be considered by the reader as broadly based."

In only one novel, The Lions of Al-Rassan, set in Moorish Spain against the backdrop of romance and divided loyalties, has Kay woven explicitly Jewish characters into the narrative. In this instance, they are a vizier and a physician.

"I was interested in the relationship between Jewish, Muslim and Christian cultures ," he said. "That struck me as a classic way to use fantasy."

In the future, he may well build a novel around a Jewish theme. "There is," he observed, "so much richness and complexity in Jewish history."

Hollywood film studios have expressed an interest in buying Kay's novels, and although nothing has been finalized as yet, Kay seems hopeful. Recently, New Line Cinema announced it would produce three films based on The Lord of the Rings. Hope springs eternal. Or so it would seem.

Hatikvah in Istanbul

By MAYA SHAPIRO

On a crowded balcony that frames the entire room, sits a middle-aged woman clutching the railing in front of her, and peering over the edge to watch the activity below.

The balcony railing is lined on all sides with gripping hands, some wrinkled and aged, others chubby and small.

From the packed floor of this modern but elaborately decorated synagogue in east Istanbul, rises a religious prayer sung loudly to the tune of Hatikvah, Israel's national anthem. Everyone is singing proudly in an ancient Hebrew that is tinted heavily with their Turkish accents. It is likely that they don't understand the words of the anthem, but the spirit is there.

The middle-aged woman grins secretively as she speaks the actual words to the Zionist anthem, and nudges the young girl beside her to join her mild rebellion. On this night, her personal plea for Eretz Tzion is drowned out by the prayer being sung. But in Istanbul's bold Jewish community, her voice is not alone.

On a recent trip to Istanbul, I had the pleasure of being a part of Turkey's Jewish community. I was struck first with the open and hospitable nature of the people I encountered, but what I remember most was the uniqueness of the community.

Turkish Jews are modern Orthodox. They are powerfully Zionistic and culturally connected to today's Israel. But they do not let their contemporary views interfere with a deep respect for traditional observance. In the absence of Jewish schools, Turks must learn this two-sided appreciation from each other.

The middle-aged woman who sat in front of me in the synagogue, was trying to pass on the love for Israel that she had learned in her youth. Her young relative was responsive, interested, and eager to participate; these are qualities that are quite common to the youth of Istanbul's Jewish community. They grow up proud and connected to their roots, despite an environment that does not at all foster the continuity of Zionism.

The singing of Hatikvah, or any Zionist song, is strongly discouraged by Turkey's adamantly nationalistic government.

Turkey is arguably Israel's most useful ally after the United States. It's geographical closeness, military strength and conflicts with Syria make Turkey a dependable friend to Israel. But Zionism is not allowed to be officially promoted, and any efforts to do so are kept secret.

The purpose of my trip was to meet with representatives from around Europe who are part of the same Zionist youth movement to which I belong. In Canada, it is called Young Judaea, and is most recognized by the six summer camps that it sponsors around the country. In Istanbul there is a chapter as well.

The members that are under the age of 18 know it as a club they participate in weekly. There, they learn Israeli folk dancing, interact with other Jewish children their age, and participate in programs where they learn about Israel and its relevance to their life.

In the midst of the seminars, discussions and programs that filled my days while I was in Istanbul, I was able to visit the synagogues and observe the vibrant Jewish community that my fellow members of the movement try so hard to preserve.

The image of that middle-aged woman clutching the railing and whispering words of Hatikvah will forever represent the community I found in Istanbul. And as I continue in my efforts for Canadian Young Judaea, I will encourage my friends here to develop the strength and promise that the Turkish community has mastered, with the hope that power does not only come from defiance, but from the freedom that we, as Jews have struggled so hard to enjoy.

Learning the Mishnah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Next week's Torah reading is one of the most famous and dramatic of the entire year as Children of Israel receive the Ten Commandments at Mount Sinai [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/exodus/torah/19252001.htm]. But Jewish tradition has held that in addition to the written law, the oral law was also handed down at Mount Sinai. Without the oral law, along with the later rabbinic interpretations that were codified into the Mishnah and Gemarah, practising the commandments of the Torah would be impossible.

Because of its clarity, many people feel comfortable attempting to learn Hebrew-language Mishnah before taking on the Aramaic-language Gemarah.

Here are some places to start.

Virtual Jerusalem provides a good basic introduction to the Mishnah [http://www.virtual.co.il/depts/torah/literature/mishna.htm] but the best overview that I have found on line is written by Rabbi Simchah Roth [http://www.jtsa.edu/lists/rmsg/intromishna.html]. It follows the development of the oral law and the reasons for its eventual written codification despite the original prohibition against doing just that.

To get the real feel for a page of Mishnah, take a look at Eliezer Segal's beautifully constructed work [http:// www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/TalmudMap/Mishnah. html]. Segal has reproduced a typical page of Mishnah, this one from the tractate of Megillah, chapter four, which deals with the halachot of reading from the Torah and the Prophets. When you click on the text, you can get an excellent insight into the structure of a page of Mishnah, and the annotation which is indispensable to its understanding.

Although it will never replace a printed set of Mishnahs, you can read the entire Mishnah in Hebrew on-line, if you have Hebrew fonts installed. It can be found at the Hebrew University site [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/mishna/].

There is a long tradition of learning and reciting Mishnahs in memory of the departed. The Torah V'chaim site [http://www.yahrzeit.org/mishnah.html] provides an explanation: "The Hebrew letters of Mishnah and of soul (neshamah) consist of the same Hebrew text. Thus referencing that the soul (neshamah) and the Mishnah are attached on a spiritual level."

V'Dibarta Bam is an Israeli organization that promotes the recital of mishnayot as a way of remembering the children who were murdered in the Shoah [http://www.pirchei.co.il/toraorgs/vdibarta/index.htm]. Each school-aged participant is given the name of a child who perished in the Holocaust in whose memory they are learning mishnayot. Since the project was launched seven years ago, the V'Dibarta Bam program has completed five full cycles of learning an incredible six million mishnayot in memory of the young victims of the Holocaust.

Another ambitious project makes heavy use of the Internet to promote the study of Mishnah. The Rabin Mishnah Study Group [http://www.jtsa.edu/lists/rmsg/] is an e-mail list which "is dedicated to the daily study of Mishnah by lay people in memory of Yitzchak Rabin in the spiritual climate of Conservative Judaism." A Mishnah is presented in modern English with basic explanatory notes, and then members post their comments, queries and responses to the list. When discussion seems to be complete on one Mishnah, the process is repeated with the next. The discussion is lead by Rabbi Simchah Roth of the Rabbinical Assembly in Israel whose world-wide virtual classroom now boasts over 700 participants.

Next week, we'll continue our look at the Mishnah on the Jewish Highway and focus on its most famous tractate, Pirkei Avot, the Ethics of our Fathers.

Rabbinic Reflections

Tu b'Shvat higi'a

By RABBI MOSHE J. YERES

Once again, Tu b'Shvat beckons us. As a young child, I recall being taught of its designation as the "Jewish Arbor Day." I remember sitting in a classroom, where every year our teachers would affix pictures of trees to the wall. We students would eagerly bring in dimes to purchase "leaves" to fill the tree. Ten dimes, 10 leaves, another JNF tree on the wall to which we could point with pride.

And we always ate figs and dates and bokser (even before carob became a health food) to recall the traditional fruits of Eretz Yisrael.

But Tu b'Shvat was always something more. To my teachers and rabbis, it was always a lesson on how Diaspora Jewry retains its connection to the Holy Land. The seasons of the year, the agricultural Shalosh Regalim were grounded in the climactic conditions of a country thousands of miles away, a country of which we, as youngsters, only caught glimpses, in black and white photos and pictures.

The centrality of Israel in our theology, philosophy and way of life was always a prime lesson of Tu b'Shvat and continues, of course, in our daily life. Libi bamizrach – my heart is in the east – was not only the call of Rabbi Yehuda Halevi, but of every Jew.

But permit me to share with you the philosophical feelings of a school boy. Tu b'Shvat to me was a transition day. In Israel, the almond trees were blooming, birds were singing from every rooftop, or so the Hebrew song went. Could spring be far behind? Besides the religious and naturalist nature of the day, Tu b'Shvat to me was a lot like Groundhog Day. Tu b'Shvat higi'a – spring is coming! There may be snow piled high outside, but old man winter is on the wane.

Without a doubt, the grass would soon be green again. Was this the overactive imagination of a young boy? Perhaps, but in truth, the rabbis of yore were aware that nature undergoes a change on Tu b'Shvat. The Talmud, in tractate Rosh HaShabna (Talmud Bavli 14a and Talmud Yerushalmi 1:2), suggests that nature is in transition at this yearly juncture.

One opinion notes that most of the rains (dare we Torontonians read here snow?) have ended; another states that until this day, the trees have drawn their sustenance from last year's rain; from today onwards, they draw their life force from this year's precipitation. Nature is changing.

So soon it will be spring, the snow will be melted, and we'll enjoy the warmth and green. Yet it is not by chance that the rabbis tied this transition day, this day of looking to the next season, to the ilanot, the trees. Trees, of all the world's flora, stand as symbols of permanence. Trees represent longevity, strength, imperviousness to the forces of nature. Trees represent the future, as much as they represent the past.

The verse in Deuteronomy 20:19 Ki ha'adam etz hasodeh is read by many commentators as a statement: Man is as the tree of the field. Tu b'Shvat looks ahead to what will come; yet the trees hark back and remind us of what was. The mighty oak with its strong, deep roots, with a trunk that withstands the harshest winds, can only offer us the message that we, as a people, Klal Yisrael, can only survive with firm grounding in our tradition.

Many peoples have tried to pull us down, to weaken us, to destroy us. But the trunk has remained strong, even if at times it is scarred. The tree has remained standing because it is grounded in firm roots. Our strength for the future is guaranteed only when we reinforce our past.

A colossus in history

Moses A Life*, by Jonathan Kirsch (Random House, $38.50).

Heinrich Heine marvelled, "How small Sinai appears when Moses stands upon it." A well-known historian wrote that Moses is the most exalted personality in ancient history. Another has stated that he is "A colossus among the great mythical figures of humanity." And the book of Deuteronomy concludes, "There has not arisen a prophet since Moses whom the Lord knew face to face."

Hollywood's latest celebration of Moses is an expensive animated epic, The Prince of Egypt.

Tradition has preserved Moses for us as an impetuous man; an intervener on behalf of the oppressed; an adjudicator, a person who shrank from his hard commission; was slow of speech; rose to the challenge of faith; a worker of miracles; a fighter grappling even with the Pharaoh and prevailing; a bearer of his people in his bosom; a provider; an intercessor who was humble, selfless, prodigious in his power to work, never rested, never gave up.

Yet, he is also described as a ruthless man of war, a punishing inquisitor, a figure of passion, contradiction and mystery.

There is no hard evidence that Moses ever lived. All that we can say about the historical Moses, states the author of this latest biography, is that "someone like the man described in the Bible might have lived at some unknowable time and place in the far-distant past, and his exploits might have been the grain of sand around which the pearly accretions of legend and lore slowly built up over the centuries, until he became the rich and provocative figure whom we find in the pages of the Bible."

But does his actual existence really matter? At the turn of the century, Achad Ha'am, famous Zionist, wrote: "Even if you succeeded in demonstrating conclusively that the man Moses never existed, or that he was not such a man as we supposed, you would not thereby detract one jot from the historical reality of the ideal Moses, the Moses who has been our leader, not only for 40 years in the wilderness of Sinai, but for thousands of years in all the wildernesses in which we have wandered since the Exodus."

Until the appearance of Moses, the ancients were open-minded about matters of faith: They freely borrowed each other's gods and goddesses; they sacrificed at each other's temples; and if they engaged in acts of terrible brutality toward one another in both war and peace, the carnage had nothing to do with fear or hatred of a rival faith. A kind of rough-and-ready utilitarianism was at work – if a strange new god or goddess seemed attractive or effective, then he or she would be embraced.

Moses changed all that. He insisted that all gods but the God of Israel were false. Moreover, he taught that the worship of false gods was not merely futile but utterly corrupt and perverse – an abomination.

Jonathan Kirsch, in retelling the biblical episodes involving Moses, interprets the familiar material in a keen, imaginative manner. More importantly, he brings pertinent material from the Talmud, Midrash and modern academic scholars. Often the views are contradictory or antagonistic and the result is a kind of jumble – but not too difficult to sort out.

It is curious that the name of Moses is seldom found in the writings that follow the Pentateuch. He is hardly mentioned in the Psalms or the prophetic books, and there is only one oblique reference to him in the Haggadah.

The rabbis venerated him as lawgiver and teacher, but they were always reluctant to overpraise him, for fear that God would be denied his due for the "signs and wonders" of the Exodus.

Moses, A Life is easy to read, undogmatic, covers a wide range of scholarly material, and introduces a wealth of kindred topics and subject matter that both teach and stimulate.

It is surprising that the author is not a trained scholar, but a student of the Bible whose previous book The Harlot by the Side of the Road was widely read and discussed.

JTS honors Toronto educator

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A longtime Jewish educator was honored this weekend as part of a special convocation at the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in New York.

"This is a very special occasion for me. I feel like it's a culmination of a lifelong effort, and it's very exciting," said retired principal Esther Gold, whose 43-year-career included lengthy stints at United Synagogue Day School (USDS) and Adath Israel Congregation's supplementary school.

Gold was one of 10 educators to receive honorary degrees at the ceremony.

A native of Israel, Gold was born in Tel Aviv and raised in Bat Yam. Her parents, Rachel and Jacob Eisenstat, were Polish immigrants who met and married in Toronto before moving to Palestine.

Esther Eisenstat immigrated here in 1957, and entered the field of Jewish education "quite by accident," she told The CJN in an interview at her Thornhill home.

An alumna of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where she studied math, physics and statistics, Gold originally planned to become an architect.

But her father, who had close relatives in Toronto, moved here in 1956, and the rest of the family soon followed.

Gold took a job as a Hebrew teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools' Talmud Torah, a now-defunct, five-day-a-week supplementary school. She also taught Grade 2 Hebrew at its day school.

Her plans to move back to Israel changed when she met her husband, David, a native of Pinczow, Poland. They married in 1958.

Although Gold had four years of teaching experience when she was a student in Israel, and a strong Jewish background, having grown up in a religious home, she arrived here with no teaching certification – a situation she was quick to remedy. She graduated from Toronto's Midrasha L'Morim in 1960.

When Gold's first son was born that same year, she decided to stay home and "be a mama."

Her re-entry into the Jewish education world came when she inquired at Adath Israel's supplementary school about job opportunities for her sister-in-law, who had just arrived from Israel. Instead, she was offered a job herself.

Although Gold wasn't eager initially, she eventually accepted an eight-hour-a-week position teaching the honor class, which had an expanded curriculum.

After nine years of teaching and raising her two sons, she became principal of the school, a position she held for half a dozen more years.

She then spent two years as Hebrew principal of Associated's Finch branch, as well as a a smaller satellite branch, before moving in 1977 to USDS.

When her own children were young, day school wasn't a popular option, she recalled. "Now it's not just acceptable, it's almost trendy to send your children to day school, and people don't always do it for ideological reasons."

At USDS, she said, it was "very important that everything should be meaningful to the child."

Before retiring in 1994, Gold served as director of the Hebrew program at USDS's three campuses. Before that, she was a vice-principal and then principal of Hebrew studies.

Over the years, she upgraded her qualifications at JTS, earning a Master's degree in Jewish Education and a principal's certificate after several summers of study in New York.

For three years she was a member of the national board of the Jewish Educators' Assembly (JEA), the Conservative organization that nominated her for the honorary doctorate. She also served as president of the association's Canadian region.

Through her contacts elsewhere in North America, she realizes that "the level of Jewish education in Toronto is very high."

There are several excellent schools in Canada, she noted.

Since her retirement, Gold served for two years as co-chair of United Jewish Appeal's education division, and she has reviewed day school curricula on two occasions, once here and once in Winnipeg.

Although she misses her students and staff, she is delighted to have time to pursue other interests. She has joined two Hebrew literary clubs that enrich her life, she said with a broad smile.

Gold attributes her love of learning to her father, a self-educated man who "always had a book in his hand. He taught himself Bible and Gemarah, and he taught himself how to speak French... He always had very high aspirations for me. Not a big house or to marry a rich man – that was not important – but to be educated and to do things that are important to society, that was important to my father."

Amy Sky to perform at USDS reunion

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Popular singer and songwriter Amy Sky will be the feature entertainer at a reunion gala marking the 36th anniversary of United Synagogue Day School.

The event will be held Feb. 1, 7 p.m., at the Ford Centre for Performing Arts.

The gala will also kick off the school's first fundraising campaign in 10 years. The "Above and Beyond Excellence Fund" will be used in such fields as technology and arts integration.

The evening will include Jewish music, a video tribute, a silent auction and raffle, a light kosher supper and a dessert reception.

Publicity co-chair Rhonda Katz told The CJN that organizers want to encourage "parents, grandparents, teachers, staff and alumni" to attend, and have deliberately kept the cost low – $36 per person.

Students at each of the three USDS campuses are creating a quilt, which will be displayed at the gala. Afterwards, the quilts will be sent back to the schools from which they came.

"Everyone is very excited," Katz said.

USDS is the largest Solomon Schechter day school in the the North American Conservative movement, according to a school publicity brochure. It was founded in 1961 as a Foundation Day School at Beth Tzedec Congregation. By 1962, it became the United Synagogue Day School, with an enrollment of 114 students.

The school expanded with the Jewish community, and in 1969 opened the Bayview Campus at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, followed in 1987 by the Richmond Hill Campus at Bayview and 16th.

It now has over 1,400 students, from nursery to grade 8.

Educating the public is key to school funding advocate

Charter couldn't compel the government to fund non-Catholic religious schools, neither did it preclude the government from doing so. The court left it up to the provincial government to do so, Levin said.

"People are surprised" when the decision is explained to them. "You don't overcome that skepticism overnight. It takes time," he said.

Furthermore, religious leaders and heads of congregations have to be convinced to lend their support to the community mobilization effort he and other volunteers have undertaken, he continued. "People don't want to be associated with a losing cause."

So far, Levin believes, he has made some progress in that regard. At Netivot HaTorah, parent volunteers have joined the effort in seeking additional signatures for the petition. Other schools have also cooperated by informing parents about the effort and circulating the petition, but more work needs to be done, Levin said.

"It's important to generate numbers to show the politicians" the breadth of the community's concern about the funding issue, Levin said.

Under current Ontario practice, Roman Catholic schools receive funding while Jewish and Protestant religious schools do not.

Levin believes the time is ripe to lobby provincial politicians on the issue, particularly since the Tories have announced they are intent on reforming the education system.

John Vannesalt, director of communications for the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools (OACS), pointed out that the Conservatives promised in their 1995 document, Blueprint for Learning in Ontario, to "examine the inclusion of denominational and other private schools in the [education] system."

Mike Harris, before he became premier, called on the former NDP government to seriously consider the issue while there have been other indications that the Tories are open to changing the current funding practice, Vannesalt said.

Congress has pushed for public funding for years

PEC was formed about one and a half years ago under the auspices of the Ontario Alliance, which represents 73 schools educating 13,000 students across the province. The purpose was to give parents the opportunity to get involved in political lobbying and speak on their own while "releasing them from organizational obligations," Vannesalt said.

Canadian Jewish Congress, OACS' counterpart in the Jewish community, supports PEC's grassroots mobilization. The Jewish organization, which has pushed for public funding for years, backed the court challenge to provincial funding practices and is now engaged in political lobbying.

The efforts of the Jewish and Protestant communities complement each other nicely, Vannesalt said. The Jewish community schools are centred primarily in Toronto while OACS' schools are located throughout the rest of the province.

Vannesalt and Levin say one strategy PEC is considering is presenting the completed petitions to local MPPs and asking them to read them in the legislature.

Vannesalt believes "there's a lot of sympathy for our position, especially within the government caucus, but that doesn't necessarily translate into action."

PEC is considering other high profile events in the Jewish community to raise its profile and mobilize public support, Levin said.

In a conversation with a senior politician, Levin was told the Ministry of Education received 86,000 letters, but " 'how many do we get on this topic? If this is such a bad burden, why aren't we writing?'

"We have to do things that make it clear we're not accepting this anymore," Levin said.

Book on wartime Swiss refugee camps planned

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A Toronto woman is writing a book about a little-known aspect of the Holocaust – Jewish refugees in Switzerland during World War II.

Frieda Forman, 61, has first-hand knowledge of the subject. She and her parents, Austrian Jews from Vienna, lived in two Swiss refugee camps from 1942 to 1946.

They were among about 30,000 Jewish refugees admitted into Switzerland from the late 1930s onward. According to historians, the Swiss authorities turned away an equal number of Jewish refugees, abandoning them to their fate.

"The story of Jewish refugees in Switzerland has been virtually absent from accounts about the Holocaust," Forman said. "Though historical and biographical works are available in French and German, the documentation in English is so sparse that this aspect of the Holocaust is in danger of vanishing entirely."

Forman has read books which deal peripherally with her topic, among them being Yehuda Bauer's American Jewry and the Holocaust and Alfred Haesler's The Lifeboat is Full.

"These essential works, however, do not begin to touch upon the details of the camps, their social organization, daily life and cultural and religious activities."

In gathering material for her book, Forman researched the archives of YIVO (Institute for Jewish Research) and the American Joint Distribution Committee in New York City. The Joint, she said, helped finance the wartime refugee camps.

She hopes to study archives in Switzerland and Israel in the near future.

One of the documents she found was a press release issued by the Joint Distribution Committee in 1943 listing the names of more than 100 Austrian Jews who had found refuge in Switzerland.

Amazingly enough, she and her brother Max were on the list, as well as their parents, Kasiel and Malka Johles.

Although Forman has amassed a fair bit of research data so far, she has been largely unsuccessful in tracking down Jewish refugees, like herself, who went through the experience of living in Swiss camps.

She has interviewed four such persons, but none in Toronto or Montreal. She can be reached at 531-2905.

Forman and her family left Vienna in 1938, shortly after Germany annexed Austria. They went to Brussels, and when the Germans occupied Belgium, they fled to Lyons, France.

In 1942, her father, who had been a grocer in Vienna, was arrested by the Vichy French government and taken to a labor camp.

Morgins – a Jewish refugee camp in wartime Switzerland.

He was released a month later on medical grounds.

During that summer, just before the Swiss government closed its borders to refugees, Forman's family crossed into Switzerland from France.

They made their way to Geneva, and then were directed to a family camp in Morgins in the Valaisian Alps, a scenic region of immense fir woods known for its ski and tobogganing runs and ice hockey and curling rinks.

Morgins, some 60 km from Geneva, housed 400 or so Jewish refugees, mainly from France, Belgium, Holland, Austria and Germany.

After Morgins, Forman and her parents lived in another camp, Clarens, a suburb of Montreaux. Her brother was never in a family camp, spending the duration of the war in a Zionist training camp in Switzerland which prepared him for aliyah.

Jewish refugees themselves administered Morgins and Clarens, two of numerous such camps in Switzerland, and achieved a great degree of autonomy.

At these camps, Forman recalled, there were schools, synagogues, theatres, newspapers and other communal institutions. "In general, one was able to make a good life for oneself. It was a humane situation."

But, as she pointed out, the refugees, set apart by class and educational disparities and political and religious dissonance, did not always get on.

As for the Swiss, they treated the refugees with respect, but as outsiders.

In her research, Forman has discovered that conditions in camps were better in the French sector of Switzerland than in German-speaking areas.

She has also learned that Swiss refugee policy varied, depending on the currents of war. When the Allies were on the ascendancy, she observed, the Swiss tended to be more liberal.

Forman has mixed feelings about Switzerland. She is eternally grateful that the Swiss admitted her and her family. But she strongly believes that Switzerland could have let in many more Jewish refugees. "It's a story of good and evil," she said.

In the aftermath of the war, Forman and her parents, now deceased, resided in Geneva before immigrating to the United States. At City University in New York, she acquired an MA in philosophy.

After settling in Toronto, Forman – the divorced mother of two grown children, Gideon and Jessica – founded the Women's Educational Resources Centre at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

In 1994, she was co-editor of Found Treasures: Stories by Yiddish Women Writers (Second Story Press).

Prof. searches the world for Holocaust survivors' accounts

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Whether he is abroad on business or pleasure, Alain Goldschlager never fails to visit second-hand bookshops in his incessant hunt for Holocaust witness accounts.

Since 1986, when he started collecting the published writings of Holocaust survivors, this dogged University of Western Ontario French professor has amassed one of the world's largest collections of its kind.

His collection, housed in the university's Holocaust Literature Research Institute, which was formally established in 1996, now stands at about 1,700 volumes in a myriad of languages running the gamut from Yiddish, Hebrew and French to German, Polish and English.

As far as he knows, 6,000 such works exist, many self-published and out of print. His goal, daunting though it may sound, is to track down and buy every last one.

"It is a life-long mission," said Goldschlager, a 52-year-old shaggy-haired scholar who was born in Belgium and settled in Canada 30 years ago.

But realistically, given the fact that self-published books are uncatalogued, he does not expect to find more than about 3,000 of these memoirs.

"Anything over that figure will come to me in dribs and drabs," he said resignedly.

Goldschlager, whose paternal grandfather died in the Theresienstadt concentration camp in what was then Czechoslovakia, regards witness accounts as exceedingly important.

"Survivors endow the Holocaust with a human face. They remind us that it was not an abstract experience."

However, he acknowledges, professional historians tend to neglect witness accounts. "They are uncomfortable with personal narratives. They bring a neutral position toward events and see them as comprehensively as possible. As a result, an emotional and individualistic approach is not welcomed."

He added, "Historians spend countless hours sifting through objective documents, but they are reluctant to give too much weight to personal accounts because of their openly subjective stance."

Although he understands their concerns, Goldschlager ultimately parts ways with scholars who underestimate the value of survivors' testimonies.

Such Holocaust literature has interested him since Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel's second trial in Toronto in the mid-1980s. At his discovery, Zundel described Adrian Arcand, the Quebec fascist leader of the 1930s and 1940s, as a "gentleman." Alarmed by Zundel's benign characterization, the B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights recruited Goldschlager, an authority on Arcand, as a resource person for the prosecution.

As it happened, Goldschlager did not testify against Zundel. But in following his trial, he was struck by the importance of survivors' first-hand accounts.

"These witnesses made a difference," he recalled.

After the trial, Goldschlager began collecting Holocaust memoirs, though his original purpose had been to compile an annotated data base for combating revisionists like Zundel. Late last year, he finally transferred the material to the Internet.

Asked to assess the quality of eye-witness accounts, he said they vary. "Some are really extraordinary, while some are fairly laborious. At the highest level, you have Primo Levi, Elie Wiesel and Anne Frank."

At his own expense, Goldschlager has travelled as far afield as Brazil and Morocco to acquire books. He has spent roughly $30,000 on this quest, but says that his late sister, Isabelle, helped.

He and the University of Western Ontario are seeking private funding for the Holocaust Literature Research Institute. It is dedicated to David Blume, Goldschlager's maternal grandfather, who founded Belgium's public library system.

Funds will be used in the search, acquisition and analysis of texts.

Apart from housing and expanding the collection, the goals of the institute are manifold: to create an annotated bibliography of Holocaust literature produced by survivors; to operate a resource centre for professors and graduate students; to generate interest in a centre for Holocaust literature courses on the undergraduate and graduate levels; to organize seminars; and to establish links with other academic Holocaust research centres.

Wake-up call to Zionism

Born in Brussels, Goldschlager was raised in a secular household. His father, Shlomo, was a diamond broker who commuted to Antwerp. An Austrian Jew from Bukovina, he became stateless after Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938. By contrast, Goldschlager's mother, Edith, was a Belgian citizen.

During the German occupation, the Goldschlagers, including their son Christian, went into hiding. They were aided by gentiles.

An atheist, Goldschlager said he "woke up" to his Jewishness during the 1967 Six Day War. "We were worried Israel would be destroyed. It was our wake-up call to Zionism."

After studying French literature at the Université Libre de Bruxelles, he left Belgium, confident that he could advance his career faster in Canada.

"I didn't like the European mentality," he explained. "There was a lack of energy and drive. I felt constrained. My youngest professor at university was 48. He was a baby!"

From 1969 until 1975, he studied at the University of Toronto. His PhD thesis was on Dutch philosopher Benedict Spinoza's influence on French religious writer Simone Weil. By the time he received his doctorate, he had already been a lecturer in French for four years at the University of Western Ontario, based in London.

Goldschlager and his wife, Lea, an Israeli-born primary school teacher, live in London with their four children.

A busy man, he is also national director of the Canada-Israel Foundation for Academic Exchanges. Its objective is to foster a better understanding between Canadian and Israeli scholars through exchange programs. Since its inception in 1974, the foundation has arranged about 300 exchanges.

Goldschlager's fascination with Holocaust witness accounts remains undimmed. Last October, he edited and contributed two essays to The Shoah: Impossible Testimony, a book about survivors' memoirs. And in November, he organized a conference in Ottawa dealing with memory and the Holocaust.

Shaare Zedek's Dropkin retires after 18 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sheila Dropkin, national director of Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, recently retired after 18 years with the foundation.

"During my tenure, the foundation has grown into a major Canadian institution with supporters across the country.

"Visitors to Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem are surprised to see the hundreds of plaques throughout the building bearing the names of Canadian supporters, and to learn of the many projects in the medical centre that are endowed by Canadians."

Dropkin, who was born and educated in New York City, received a bachelor's degree in journalism from New York University. She worked as an editorial assistant for Mademoiselle magazine.

In 1961, she and her husband Arthur moved to Montreal, where she was a volunteer director of public relations for the Cancer Research Society and a feature writer for The Suburban Newspapers. When the family moved to Vancouver, she established a local office of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

Shortly after moving to Toronto in 1979, she worked part time as public relations director at Shaare Zedek. She worked as assistant national director before becoming national director 14 years ago.

Bernard Abrams, national president of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, is seen with Sheila Dropkin, former national director, at a retirement lunch in her honor.

"It's been a true pleasure and honor to work with the Shaare Zedek board in Canada, and on behalf of this outstanding institution. It is one of the foremost health- care institutions in Israel, with a remarkable staff, some of whom are originally from Canada. I'm proud to have had a role in its development and growth."

While with Shaare Zedek, Dropkin helped raise funds for the new Jesselson Heart Centre and the Woman and Infant Centre.

Renee Solursh, immediate past national president of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, says, "Shaare Zedek Medical Centre and Sheila Dropkin became synonymous because of Sheila's keen sense of the needs of the hospital."

Dropkin also serves as national director of Canadian Friends of Massuah, a Holocaust education centre located on a kibbutz near Netanya. "I plan to continue with this position in my retirement and also hope to do more writing. Perhaps I will undertake public relations and event planning assignments for other organizations."

The Dropkins are members of Beth Tzedec Synagogue, where she is in the second year of a two-year adult bar/bat mitzvah class.

She is a member of Hadassah-WIZO, the Baycrest Centre Women's Auxiliary and she works out six days a week at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

"There's a special camaraderie among those of us who are there at the crack of dawn, winter and summer, which has evolved into a family-like atmosphere."

Canadian to deliver prestigious lecture in Scotland

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – For the first time, a professor at a Canadian university has been selected to deliver the prestigious Lord Hay of Seaton Lecture at the University of Aberdeen, Scotland.

Prof. David Novak, the J. Richard and Dorothy Shiff Chair of Jewish Studies and the director of the Jewish studies program at the University of Toronto (U of T), will deliver the Seaton lecture on Feb. 16.

The following day Novak will present the same lecture, entitled Judaism and Christianity and the Moral Crisis of Our Time, at the Jewish Policy Centre in London, England.

According to Novak, the late Malcolm Hay, who was the last Lord of Seaton and heir to one of the greatest and oldest estates in Scotland, became deeply concerned about the Jewish victims of Nazi persecution during World War II, and thus he devoted considerable effort to saving as many Jewish lives as he could.

Prof. David Novak

Novak said Hay subsequently dedicated himself to fighting sources of anti-Semitism and published a widely acclaimed book, Thy Brother's Blood. After his death in 1960, his widow continued his work and upon her death, she left a bequest for a lecture in her husband's memory to be given from time to time on Jewish-Christian relations.

Previous Seaton lecturers have included Cardinal Johannes Willebrands, head of the Vatican Secretariat on Jewish-Christian Relations, and Abba Eban, the former foreign minister of the State of Israel, Novak noted.

The U of T professor, who teaches in the philosophy and religion departments as well as the Joint Centre for Bioethics and the Institute of Medical Science, was the Edgar M. Bronfman Professor of Modern Judaic Studies at the University of Virginia from 1989-97.

Novak has had 10 books published, the latest being Natural Law in Judaism (Cambridge University Press, 1998). His 11th book, Covenantal Rights, is slated to be published by Princeton University Press in 1999.

He said that as totalitarian regimes have receded in the last two decades, there is less internal unanimity in the West on moral questions.

In the Seaton lecture, Novak said he will discuss the secular and Jewish responses to such important moral issues as the beginning and end of human life, human relationships, and the deep divisions in democratic societies.

"Clearly, religious communities cannot be oblivious to this state of affairs," he told The CJN.

He noted that the difference between Judaism and Christianity is over what constitutes the fullest possible relationship with God in this world, and who will bring about the future kingdom of God.

"The crucial difference is not moral," he said. "In morality there is or can be virtual unanimity between these two communities, one that is more than a matter of historical remembrance alone."

He said he believes that Judaism and Christianity, "even though well known for their historical animosity one to the other, can now constitute a new relationship of dialogue and cooperation when that relationship is centred on their joint moral message for the world at large."

PA 'preparing children for war'

During his North American visit, he also travelled to Washington to brief congressional staffers on his findings.

The United States along with several European countries and even Canada help finance Palestinian schools through the PA' s ministry of education, he said. Educators from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and from among the Palestinians themselves help create the curricula used in PA schools, he added.

CIDA spokesperson Michelle Velleux rejected suggestions that Canada had helped fund Palestinian education programs.

After checking with its Ramallah office, CIDA concluded, "We are not funding any project involving financing of curricula."

Bedein has been drawing attention to warlike Palestinian rhetoric for some time, but he believes the situation has worsened in recent months.

"Before there were intermittent instances of Palestinian children being called to war. Now it's the official curriculum of the Palestinian Authority," he said.

During celebrations marking the fifth anniversary of Oslo last year, Bedein met with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat and asked him about the school curricula.

Arafat denied Palestinian children were being taught anything "against the Jews and he spoke about people-to-people programs for Israeli and Palestinian children," Bedein said.

But after further investigation back in Israel, "I found out that the PA had vetoed the programs after they had received funding for them." Bedein claimed the programs were cancelled "on Arafat's orders."

"There is no evidence that the PA ever had intended to have a peace curriculum," he said. "This was a means of getting easy money from foreign governments."

Bedein believes Arafat, the PA and the Palestine Liberation Organization "have a purpose. Their purpose is to reclaim the land of Palestine...and to train its children to do so."

Arafat, he added, continues to plan for the day when a Palestinian state will replace the State of Israel.

'Take a look at the reality'

That analysis helps explain the day-to-day difficulties in the peace process. "Hundreds of different circles in Israel and abroad give the impression there are no real problems with the peace process, just a few technical things to work out.

"The reality, however, is that the PA is implementing a school curriculum that "fights against peace...People should suspend their own views of the peace process and take a look at the reality on the ground," he said.

Bedein, who acknowledges his views place him on the right wing of Israeli politics, said his news agency is supported by private contributions from the United States and Israel – particularly from Holocaust survivors.

His major supporter is the Daniels Foundation of Florida while three other U.S. families and some in Israel also provide him with financial backing.

Journalists discuss media's coverage of Middle East

By ELISE LEVINOFF
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Students at York University got the scoop on Israel and the media, as part of Israel Week on Campus.

Mordechai Ben-Dat, CJN editor, and Eliot Zimelman, assistant foreign editor of the National Post, spoke about the current situation regarding Israel and the media at a recent program.

The program dealt with perceptions of how western journalists report current events from Israel. It also gave students a sense of how journalists in Israel deal with news-breaking stories without allowing their opinions to overshadow their report.

Ben-Dat, speaking about bias in media coverage in the Diaspora, said it is important for Jewish readers to be able to recognize what is misleading in the media.

He said that reporters in general, and especially those covering Middle East affairs, tend to work in packs, and that the western world tends to be more sympathetic to the Palestinian cause than to the Israeli cause.

Zimelman, who worked for nine years at the Jerusalem Post, as page designer, copy editor and night editor, said Israeli and western journalists shared similar problems. He said the Israeli media tends to be provocative against the government in power and also has a tendency to attack the right.

Objective reporting

Zimelman also spoke about how Israeli journalists reporting in Israel need to separate themselves from their passion for Israel, and report in an objective manner. When he covered Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in 1995, he needed to be objective, and at the same time, deal with his own issues about the tragedy, he said.

The event, sponsored by Jewish Campus Services, was one among several planned by York students.

There was also an Israel Fair supplying information about Israel's people, history, religious affiliations, technology and summer programs.

Elise Levinoff is a student at York University. She co-chaired Israel Week.

Winnipeg Reform rabbi to marry same sex couples

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After an almost eight-year struggle to get the Reform movement accepted within the greater Jewish community here, Temple Shalom's new spiritual leader, Rabbi Michael Levenson, is in the middle of a controversy.

The board has approved the rabbi's request to perform mixed and same sex marriages in Winnipeg for the first time.

"I have heard the arguments that this decision will hurt the community and weaken the Jewish people," says Rabbi Levenson, who took over the pulpit from Rabbi Jeffrey Gale in the fall. "I sympathize with my colleagues and other critics' position, but I disagree. I believe this will strengthen the community by bringing in more people than we lose."

The widespread national publicity that his position has garnered, Levenson says, has also resulted in a torrent of hate mail, much of it from Alberta.

Rabbi Levenson, who was ordained from Hebrew Union College about 20 years ago, grew up in an Orthodox home in Montreal, but turned to the Reform movement in his teens. He led congregations in the United States, and for the past two years, had been back in Montreal.

"I wanted to stay in Canada within the Reform movement," he says.

"There was an opening, and Winnipeg seemed to be a nice place to settle. This is a warm community.

"The challenge is to build up a relatively small congregation in a somewhat declining, largely Conservative and traditional Jewish community."

Levenson notes that his decision to perform mixed and same sex marriages is a position that has evolved over the years. "The Reform movement does not encourage this. Rather, the decision is left to the individual rabbi.

"I have given this tremendous thought. When you are young, your principles are intact. When you are older, you see more clearly the subtleties. It disturbed me to see the growing number of gay congregations for example. We need to include all Jews in the community, not segregate some as pariahs."

When Rabbi Levenson was interviewed at Temple Shalom, he made clear his intention to perform mixed and same sex marriages. The congregation was willing to accommodate his desires.

"We didn't rush into this," says Joann Greisman, the congregation's president. "It took us four months to write our new policies. Rabbi Levenson obviously has given his position a great deal of thought, and that impressed us."

Levenson says that the board and the congregation have backed him despite the controversial nature of the decision. He says that half the members are from interfaith marriages or partnerships where one person is a convert.

Although Rabbi Levenson has yet to perform a marriage ceremony for a gay or an interfaith couple, he has a number scheduled for the spring.

He emphasizes, however, that he doesn't intend for Temple Shalom to become an "interfaith factory," where couples come for quickie marriages and disappear. He will insist that bride and groom (or the gay partners) study Judaism with him for a year, and participate actively in the synagogue and Jewish community.

"There has to be a spiritual commitment, whether those involved are Jewish or non-Jewish," he says.

Since Rabbi Levenson came to Temple Shalom, between 20 and 25 new families have joined, boosting membership to about 112 people.

Kallah an eye-opener for Ontario teens

BARRIE — Twenty teengers and seven staffers took part in this year's Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region (CJC) high school outreach program for teens living in small communities.

For 13-year-old Steve Gillman of Peterborough, and other participants in the program, the kallah was "an eye opener. I joined the three-year education program because I wanted to learn more about the Holocaust and contemporary Jewish history," said Gillman, following the weekend program at the Wildfire Outdoor Education Centre.

After a talk on racism and neo-Nazism in Canada, by Dani Fine, CJC, Ontario region's director of community relations, Gillman said, "I did not realize that there had been lots of Neo-Nazi and racist activities in Canada in recent times."

Leanne Rosen, program coordinator, said that Fine's address "provoked much discussion. We talked about scapegoating, how people become racist and hatemongers, and how to react to anti-semitic or racist incidents."

The group is planning a trip to Washington during March break, which will include a visit to the U.S. Holocaust Museum.

Seth Winberg, 15, of Oakville felt that "We really jelled together as a group at this kallah."

Volunteer Ari Shapiro observed "lots more cohesiveness and friendships among the teenagers."

Rosen organized activities such as the Jewish Survival Game, in which teens were divided into groups, and had to decide which three aspects they chose as critical to Jewish survival.

All four groups selected God and Torah as Rosen expected, but she found it interesting, she said, that they also chose Jewish friends and youth groups.

"Because the youngsters live in small communities, where they may be the only Jew in their high school, Jewish friends and youth groups become a more important issue than keeping kosher and keeping the Shabbat."

Debates by Michael Soberman, CJC Ontario region's director of community services and youth activities, and volunteer Michael Ostroff, featured such topics as the use of research from medical experiments during the Holocaust, and Faith and God after the Holocaust.

Kallah participants voiced their opinions and questioned the panelists. There was also a discussion following the viewing of the film Schindler's List.

Emmalea Davis, 13, of Dunsford (near Peterborough) said, "I was most interested how people reacted or did not react to the Holocaust," she said.

Volunteer Sarah Chalmers, 18, of Peterborough, an alumnus of the last outreach program, was asked several questions about Israel. The three-year outreach program culminates with a trip to Israel in the summer of 2000.

At the winter kallah near Barrie students come together in a sing-along. Clockwise from Seth Winberg, Oakville, on guitar, are Sarah Albert, Peterborough; Michael Brenner, Barrie; Adam Levine, Barrie; Alexandra Rawek, Peterborough; Leah Chalmers, Peterborough; Sarah Chalmers (alumnus), Peterborough; and Steve Mendel Burlington.

Immigration to Winnipeg up in '98

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The number of Jewish immigrant families who settled in Winnipeg in 1998 was up slightly from the year before, says Emily Shane, executive director of the Jewish Child and Family Service.

She reports that more than 60 families came to the city from overseas last year compared with 55 in 1997.

Twenty-six families from the economically depressed Ukraine, made up the largest number of newcomers from one place. There were also four families from Bosnia and another four from South America.

Argentina

In the past two years, more than a dozen Argentinian families have moved to Winnipeg and Shane says, two more are coming to visit soon to decide if they want to live here.

"We have 25 pre-migration cases mostly from eastern Europe that we are preparing for now," she notes.

"That is considerably more than usual. Our usual figure is five or six."

She says that Manitoba's provincial government is strongly encouraging immigration to this city.

Shane says the government is particularly looking for people with ties to the city and an ethnic community that can help find long-term employment for them.

Lipkin-Shahak, Mordechai join forces

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The new centrist party may market its candidate for prime minister, ousted Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, with the No. 2 person on the list, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, as a "ticket," in the style of candidates for president and vice president in the United States.

The idea would be for the two to tour the country, meet the people and hold rallies as a pair during the campaign for the May elections.

Decision makers in the centrist group believe the Mordechai-Shahak combination is unique in Israeli politics and can draw voters from across the entire political and ethnic spectra.

Sunday night Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Mordechai's farewell speech to the cabinet, in which he put on a kippah and read from the Psalms, "a good show."

Aides to Mordechai denied reports that he might consider the option of dropping out of the race and linking up with Labor Party leader Ehud Barak, should it become clear on the eve of the elections that he has little prospect of advancing to the second round against Netanyahu.

Mordechai accused Netanyahu and the government of conducting a policy of placating the extremists, which was destroying the relations between Israel and its neighbors, to the point of jeopardizing national security.

In a tough but emotional speech to Likud activists at Kfar Hamaccabiah in Ramat Gan – the same venue where on Saturday night he was publicly fired by Netanyahu – Mordechai said that in recent weeks he had reached the conclusion that Israel needs a different leadership, which is "sure of itself, is fired by belief and is guided by the public good."

He said that the Likud leadership "had strayed from its true path, from its values, and is forcing us onto a road that will not advance the peace and will hurt security." He said that the government was under the sway of "two or three extremists."

Moshe Arens, to whom Netanyahu offered the defence portfolio in place of Mordechai, declined to say whether he would accept the post.

Speaking before a few dozen supporters at a recent rally in Rehovot, Arens said he was preoccupied solely with the primaries race at this stage. However, he did not reject the offer either.

Arens also refused to comment on Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon's disclosure that Netanyahu had offered him the defence portfolio. Netanyahu made his pitch to Sharon after he had already offered the post to Arens.

Sharon said Netanyahu had offered him the defence portfolio, but that he had turned down the offer because he preferred to retain his two current portfolios of foreign affairs and national infrastructure.

IDF chief warns Netanyahu against Lebanon adventure

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Choosing his words carefully but making himself clear, Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz issued a tacit recommendation to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and to Moshe Arens, whom Netanyahu has asked to replace the ousted Yitzhak Mordechai as defence minister: "Don't drag the army into an adventurist operation in Lebanon.

"The demand that the IDF reduce the number of Israeli casualties in Lebanon is completely legitimate," Mofaz told high school students in Holon. "It is in Israel's national interest to leave the security zone in Lebanon. The question is, under what conditions? It would be right to take that step as part of an agreement, provided someone else take security responsibility for the region."

Mofaz said he hoped the withdrawal would come on his watch, "but a unilateral pullout is an unreasonable risk that is tantamount to a dangerous gamble." Therefore, he said, "our professional opinion is that we have to continue with the current policy."

The IDF, he emphasized, "has no intention, interest or desire to escalate the situation in Lebanon. All our activity is geared to one purpose: to ensure the security of the country's northern residents."

Mofaz's remarks reflect the two major concerns of the high command in the wake of Mordechai's dismissal. First, that the only still functioning channel of communication between Israel and the Palestinian Authority has been severed; and second, that the prime minister will attempt a high-risk move in Lebanon just ahead of the elections, such as a unilateral withdrawal preceded by a massive military operation.

Israel Election Notebook

May 17

• Netanyahu criticized Barak for refusing to sign a joint letter to President Bill Clinton requesting the release of Jonathan Pollard. Barak subsequently criticized Netanyahu for making the release of Pollard a campaign issue.

• Uzi Landau withdrew his bid to challenge Netanyahu for the leadership of the Likud party on the basis that he and recently declared candidate Moshe Arens appealed to the same constituency.

• A newly formed women's rights party registered to participate in the election. The acronym for the party, which includes activists from several women's groups, is Yesh. It stands for "equal representation."

• Amir Peretz, Histadrut Labor Federation chair, launched a new party before approximately 2,000 cheering supporters. "One Nation" will be a workers' party focussing on all aspects of social welfare and employment rights.

• If Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai joins the centrist party, he will have to resign from his post as defence minister at once, a senior official in the Prime Minister's Office said last Thursday.

"Such a measure by Mordechai in the present circumstances would amount to jeopardizing the security of Israel," the official said.

"If he wants, he can go with us. If not, not. We don't operate on a personal basis. There are no people who are needed of their own right," Netanyahu said in response to reports that Mordechai was very close to deciding to leave the Likud and join the centrist party.

• Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom last Thursday called on the National Religious Party's (NRP) conference to join forces and stand united behind Netanyahu.

The NRP had not yet decided which candidate to formally support for prime minister. Yahalom said at the Jerusalem conference that it was a mistake to bring down Netanyahu's government, adding that the NRP lit the fire, but that now, "we have to face the facts and know that the only candidate with a chance is Netanyahu and we must not repeat old mistakes."

Falwell explains 'Antichrist' remark

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Rev. Jerry Falwell's recent statement that the Antichrist is probably a Jewish man alive today, is anti-Semitic and could potentially ignite widespread anti-Semitism, according to officials at Jewish organizations.

It has also done serious damage to the dialogue between Jews and evangelical Christians, they say.

Falwell's statement "borders on anti-Semitism at best and is anti-Semitic at worst," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

"Falwell's is an influential voice among evangelical and charismatic Christians," said Rabbi Leon Klenicki, director of interfaith affairs for the ADL.

What Falwell said reflects his "lack of understanding of Judaism and the Jewish people in God's design. He sees us only as the ones who prepare the coming of Jesus," Rabbi Klenicki said.

"It is a great disappointment after more than 30 years of dialogue; he's still in the Middle Ages."

Two weeks ago Falwell told about 1,500 people gathered in Tennessee that he believes Jesus will return within a decade.

Before that event can take place, Falwell and others believe that a figure known as the Antichrist will arise and spread universal evil, but will be conquered at the Second Coming of the Christian messiah.

Is the Antichrist "alive and here today"? Falwell asked his parishioners and the millions of people who tune into his Sunday-morning service, which is broadcast on television and radio from his Lynchburg, Va., church.

"Probably," he said, "because when he appears during the Tribulation period he will be a full-grown counterfeit of Christ. Of course he'll be Jewish."

Falwell was quoted as saying that he did not intend his remark to be anti-Jewish. He said that he meant only that the Antichrist must be Jewish because Jesus was a Jew.

That idea is a "hateful myth," said Foxman of the ADL. "Reverting back to a distorted interpretation of the text of the New Testament, he revisits the worst in intolerance that resulted in the persecution of the Jewish people and inquisitions."

Phil Baum, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, along with Jack Rosen, president of the group, issued a statement saying that Falwell's view "will have an inevitably incendiary and degrading effect on Christian attitudes toward Jews."

Concern is also spreading among leaders of Jewish groups that Falwell's will be the first of many such remarks as the millennium approaches.

Falwell has, in the past, been a strong supporter of the State of Israel and has met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"He supports Israel for his own Christological ends," Klenicki said.

"My concern is that when the year 2000 comes and he realizes that the Jewish people will not convert to Christianity, that he'll be critical of the State of Israel."

Russian exodus urged

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Many Russians believe life here would be better if it were not for the Jews.

Some 36 percent of recent callers to a Moscow radio station said Russia would benefit if all Jews left for Israel.

The radio station said a record number of 3,100 people called to voice their opinion on the issue last week during the daily show of the Moscow Echo radio station.

The station posed the question about Jewish emigration, after Israeli Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, who visited Russia last week, urged Jews from Russia and other former Soviet states to immigrate to Israel.

In Moscow, meanwhile, Sharon discussed the Middle East peace process with Primakov, who told Sharon that Russia wanted to play a more active role in the region.

Primakov, a longtime Middle East expert, who is known as an Arabist, said Russia strongly supported the land-for-peace formula in the Israeli-Palestinian peace settlement.

Sharon welcomed Russia's desire to revive its influence in the region, and said Moscow should use its close ties with the Palestinians to prevent the Palestinian Authority from taking unilateral steps, such as declaring independence.

Sharon and his Russian hosts also discussed bilateral relations, the rise of anti-Semitism in Russia and security issues, including international terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction in the Middle East.

In talks with Primakov and Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov, Sharon touched on the sensitive issue of Russian help for Iran's nuclear and missile programs.

Ben-Gurion biographer boasts superb storytelling skills

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

Shabtai Teveth holds a title many would be afraid of, that of being David Ben-Gurion's biographer.

Born in 1925, Teveth is one of Israel's most accomplished historians. But, like the two great leaders he has written about –Ben-Gurion and Moshe Dayan – Teveth doesn't like to talk about his achievements. He does, however, like to talk about theirs.

Teveth explained that doing research on Ben-Gurion "could be very frustrating because he belonged to a culture that tried not to talk about ego, ambitions, careers."

Teveth did not want to talk about his own career; he wanted to delve into Ben-Gurion's life story. He quickly summarized his family life. He is the son of pioneering parents who worked on a kibbutz then moved around the country before settling in Tel Aviv, where he and his sister grew up.

After high school on a kibbutz, Teveth did his military service, and then studied at Jerusalem's Hebrew University. He is presently a senior research fellow at the Dayan Centre for Middle East Studies at Tel Aviv University, which he helped set up.

In a Tel Aviv apartment/converted office, surrounded by book shelves from floor to ceiling, including a full bookcase of dictionaries, Teveth recently spoke with The Canadian Jewish News about his upcoming lecture in Toronto, and his passion for Ben-Gurion.

"I've been interested in Ben-Gurion from the first day I started working as a newspaperman. I was deputy editor of the army paper just at the end of my military service and I was sent to interview him in 1949," said Teveth, whose only wall without a bookshelf, has photos of the late founder of the State of Israel, mixed with photos of his children and grandchildren.

"Just as I sat down, before I could ask him a question, he let a barrage of his questions fall on me. By the time he ended his questions, the interview was already over."

Teveth would go on to interview Ben-Gurion hundreds of times.

Ben-Gurion's was not his first biography. "I did a biography of Moshe Dayan that turned out to be successful," Teveth said. "Then my publisher here said, 'Now look, you did Dayan, you're not going to start writing a book on someone lesser than Dayan. And there is only one [person] who is somewhat bigger; that's Ben-Gurion.'"

Since it took him two to three years to complete Dayan's biography, Teveth, who figured Ben-Gurion to be "three times the man Dayan was," thought it would take him between six and nine years to write Ben-Gurion's life story.

Shabtai Teveth

"It's taken me already almost 20 years," he said with a chuckle.

Three volumes of the multi-volume biography have been published in Hebrew and English. The fourth volume is currently in progress.

Religious pluralism

Because there is so much information on Ben-Gurion and his era, Teveth has written three books which are spinoffs of the subject: Ben Gurion and the Holocaust, Ben Gurion's Spy: The Story of the Political Scandal That Shaped Modern Israel, and Ben Gurion and the Palestinian Arabs: From Peace to War.

Teveth's books read more like suspense novels than history books. His superb storytelling skills, a result of his more than 20 years as a journalist for Ha'aretz newspaper, helps hook the reader into his subject matter. Even in a casual conversation, it is obvious how much research he has undertaken in his projects.

Teveth, who has travelled on lecture and book tours through the United States, Canada, Russia and in London, England, has yet to publicly address the subject of his upcoming Toronto lecture: Ben-Gurion and present day Israel.

After reading his works, one has a clear understanding that the author believes Ben-Gurion's heritage is still very much a part of today's politics and society in Israel and the Jewish world.

The current issue of religious pluralism is, according to Teveth, the result of having no constitution, which Ben-Gurion had tried to establish.

"Ben-Gurion did not want a Kulturkampf; he wanted to avoid the question of state and synagogue.

"The reason he wanted this was that Zionists who came here were the minority. If we wanted the majority of Jewish people to come and live here, we could not prevent those that are in disagreement from coming.

"Ben-Gurion thought that once a majority of Jewish people would live in Israel, this would be a time to draw a constitution...He didn't want to draw a constitution before a greater part of the Jewish people lives in Israel."

As Teveth pointed out again and again, Ben Gurion, were he alive today, would be upset that not more Jews live in Israel.

"When the law of return was passed, the question of who is a Jew became very troubling. Ben-Gurion wanted to avoid bringing to a head this question. In his absence, this question has really gotten out of hand because of political and coalitionary considerations. Parts of the very Orthodox got a much stronger voice, and they have already made answers to who is a Jew: Mainly he who heeds the Orthodox rabbi, only he is a Jew," said Teveth, whose left-wing sympathies are no secret.

"There is no room for Conservative and Reform and lay people. This is one thing that Ben-Gurion would not have liked. If we had been under his leadership, we would not be where we are today. I don't think he would allow one group to dominate the other."

As the interview wound down, Teveth reminded me that "Ben-Gurion is a phenomenon worth telling about, that he is a strength of will."

Teveth's talk, sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple, The Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation and Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, is being held Feb. 1, 8 p.m., at Holy Blossom, 1950 Bathurst St.

Eating disorders explored by Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In keeping with the theme (Trash the Diet!) of Eating Disorder Awareness Week, Feb. 5 has been designated Fearless Friday. Canadians will be encouraged to eat without guilt or fear of weight gain.

The awareness week, running from Feb. 1 to 6, is in its 11th year. Saving lives and educating the public are its prime goals.

In the Jewish community, a Sunday symposium on eating disorders, to be held May 2 at the Lipa Green building, is in the works. The program is a combined initiative of Emunah Women, Netivot HaTorah Day School, Ulpanat Orot and Jewish Family &Child Service (JF&CS).

"We [in the Orthodox community] think we're immune from anything that goes on in the rest of the world. We're not," said symposium chair Shawna Magence, who was hospitalized at age 16 for an eating disorder.

The 28-year-old Emunah Women member and mother of three still battles her disorder. "It doesn't matter what weight you are. It's about the way you eat, the way you think about food."

Within the Orthodox community,"unique pressures" arise when children reach marriageable age, noted Selma Elzas, Orthodox outreach worker at JF&CS.

"The idea of shidduch is a major one [in terms of] how thinness and looks impact on a girl's acceptability. Families or intermediaries have been known to ask very personal and outrageous questions about the girl, which specifically relate to her body image, size and tendency to put on weight."

Elzas, who is on the symposium committee, does not foresee much change "unless we start doing some education of the community and the young men...That has to be done through the schools and the yeshivas."

A recent news release from the National Eating Disorder Information Centre (NEDIC) reported that more than 100,000 men and women in Ontario have clinical eating disorders.

Most people who have anorexia – drastic weight loss from excessive dieting – don't know their lives are threatened, but up to 20 percent die from related complications, according to the Toronto-based organization. Up to 10 percent of people with bulimia – binging and self-induced vomiting, abuse of laxatives or over-exercising – also die.

"Because dieting exacerbates low self-esteem...and perpetuates unrealistic myths about appearance, NEDIC is asking people to trash their scales, diet pills, laxatives and diet books," said Margaret Beck, NEDIC's acting program coordinator. Special trash cans will be at all awareness week events.

"Eating disorders are chronically under-serviced in a big way," psychiatrist Leora Pinhas, director of the eating disorders treatment program at Newmarket's York County Hospital, told The CJN.

In Toronto there are inpatient hospital units specifically for eating disorder patients at the Toronto Hospital and at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, Pinhas said. They are the only two between London and Kingston.

"And what happens when they get full?" she asked. "Sick Kids is often full, because there are lots of kids struggling with this illness."

In York Region alone, she added, five youngsters now occupy general hospital beds because of eating disorders. "It's clear they need specialized treatment."

At York County, Pinhas runs an intensive, multifaceted, five-day-a-week outpatient program for adolescents with eating disorders. To the best of her knowledge, it's the only one of its kind in Ontario. It opened last spring and treats eight patients at a time.

Ten inpatient beds – some of which are to be used for eating disorders – have been designated as adolescent mental health beds, pending funding, she said.

Pinhas is also working on a research project comparing the rate of eating disorders in the Jewish population to that in the general population. She is studying a total of about 2,000 students at three public high schools and three Jewish schools.

"There is some suggestion in the literature that the prevalence may be higher in some groups, like Catholics or Jews," said Pinhas.

"I think we have to educate people," said Elzas, of JF&CS. "We have a lot of work to do."

Toronto-area events for Eating Disorder Awareness Week include:

• Parents Unite!! – an evening program Feb. 2 at Harbord Collegiate Institute, for parents of children with eating disorders or those concerned about prevention.

• New Face of Fitness Workshop – Feb. 3, 7 p.m. at the Metro-Central YMCA. The workshop, hosted by Dee Hakala, author of Thin Is Just a Four Letter Word, will encourage people of all sizes to enjoy exercise.

• Bodies With Color, Bodies That Matter – Feb. 4, Robert Gill Theatre. An evening of performance art celebrating diversity and exploring challenges regarding eating problems and size acceptance in communities of color.

• The Weight Debate: Dieting and Non-Dieting Perspectives on Obesity and Weight Loss – a one-day conference at the Vaughan Estate, Feb. 5. International experts debate dieting, obesity and the politics of weight prejudice.

The 'Col. Sanders of Comedy'

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

If, as a child, Budd Friedman was ever admonished with the words, "no more funny business," fans of comedy should be grateful he didn't listen.

As founder of the Improv chain; co-creator of the American Comedy Awards seen on the Fox Television Network; producer and host of the A&E series, Evening At The Improv; former manager of Jay Leno and Bette Midler, and mentor to some of the greatest comic minds of the last 35 years, including Drew Carey, David Spade, Jerry Seinfeld, Adam Sandler and the late Andy Kaufman, Friedman knows what tickles the funnybone.

From his office at the West Coast Improv on Melrose Avenue in Los Angeles, Friedman shared his views on Jewish humor and Jews in comedy with The CJN. "I find most Jewish humor to be anti-Semitic, and I am very, very cognizant of it. I won't tolerate it, both personally or otherwise.

"Bob (Super Dave) Einstein used to produce the Dick Van Dyke Show. Andy Kaufman was to appear on that show. It was Andy's first television show, so I went to see Andy, and I met Bob. Bob was doing a warm up in between takes. He had a bag of silver dollars in his hand, and invited the audience to tell a joke and earn a silver dollar. This guy gets up, starts telling this joke, and Bob, who towers over him, asks the guy if this is a '[Jewish] joke.' The guy says no, goes on with the joke, and of course, it was. Bob almost booted him off the stage. It was so great to see."

Friedman says that people who do put-down humor, think nothing of attacking anything or anyone. He won't tolerate it, he says, especially with Jewish comedians, who tell jokes that keep the stereotype alive.

"I think proportionately, there are fewer Jewish comics today than there were 35 years ago, because comedy came out of the ghetto. Just like fighters used to be Jews, there are no more Jewish fighters because we don't have to get out of the ghetto. Now, it's the blacks that have to get out of the ghetto. So the blacks are the fighters and comics coming up.

"Comedy for the most part was a very urban phenomenon, the bigger the city, like Chicago and New York, the more comics. Now, with the advent of cable television, people see comics from all walks of life. A guy watching comedy on HBO in Milwaukee, Wis., thinks he can do that, and then does it. Besides, being a stand up comedian has become a very glamorous and more rewarding, or seemingly so, profession."

Friedman will be gracing the silver screen this fall in Man on the Moon, the story of Andy Kaufman, starring Danny DeVito and Jim Carrey. The impressario auditioned and won, the role of Budd Friedman.

All the while, Friedman continues to reign over his franchised, Improv empire, just wanting to be thought of as, the "Col. Sanders of Comedy."

Opera Hall of Fame inducts singer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Canadian opera singer Clarice Carson was recently inducted into the Canadian Opera Hall of Fame.

Carson, a soprano, who sang her first operatic role in 1959, retired from performing in 1986. During her career, she sang at such places as the Metropolitan Opera, Covent Garden, Scottish Opera, The Lyric Opera of Chicago, The Netherlands Opera, La Fenice in Venice, Teatro Regio in Torino and with companies in Latin America.

Her roles have included Desdemona in Otello, Donna Anna in Don Giovanni, Fiordiligi in Cosi Fan Tutte and Contessa in Nozze di Figaro.

Carson is a native of Montreal, and has lived in Toronto for 12 years. "I can't explain it, but per capita, Canada has produced more great international opera singers than any other country in the world.

"One of the great things about L'Opera de Montreal while I was in my career was that they made admirable efforts to engage many of our splendid Canadian singers."

She says that although it is harder to break into the field than it was when she was starting out, "great voices have no problems, although it takes more than a great voice to succeed.

"Most of all, singers need ambition. They have to want to succeed. As well, they must be curious about the era they are reproducing. Singers must understand, for instance, what happened in Spain in the Middle Ages.

"Singers cannot bring a 20th century sensibility to woman's situation in 1812 Paris. They must know what went on then, and put themselves into the period."

Carson says that singers also have to be prepared for the life."It can be very lonely travelling alone. It was my choice, though, and I would not change it for anything.

"My parents, who were both amateur singers, encouraged me. When my father heard me sing at the Met, he had a lot of naches."

In order to encourage young singers to develop their careers, Carson is helping to raise money for the International Resource Centre for Performing Arts, a non-profit charitable organization, founded in 1984 by Ann Summers.

The centre helps classical performing artists make the transition from school to steady employment, she notes. "Most schools do not prepare performers for the reality of a career. They need to be taught how to market their talent."

The centre also brings employers to Toronto in order to save performers travel and hotel expenses. Its goal, says Carson, is to keep artists connected to the industry, once their formal training is completed and they are freelance artists looking for work.

Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

GORBACHEV, KISSINGER AT DAN TEL AVIV HOTEL

Yaakov Sudri, general manager of the Dan Tel Aviv Hotel, was in a bit of a quandary recently when 90 prominent international statesmen and stateswomen, past and present, assembled at the hotel for a board meeting and peace conference for the 2-year-old Peres Centre for Peace.

Although delighted to welcome such dignitaries as former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger, former South African president F.W. de Klerk and South African Archbishop Desmond Tutu, Sudri indicated that his dilemma was "what suite or deluxe room to allocate to each individual."

Part of the problem was solved, however, after Kissinger and de Klerk declined the presidential suite and offered it to Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski.

Other parties at the gathering included Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Musa, former Egyptian prime minister Mustafa Khalil, former Norwegian prime minister Thorbjorn Jagland, and the head of the Jordanian royal court, Jawad Anani.

The premiere hotel chain in Israel, the Dan regards itself as the "unofficial" host to presidents, statespersons and international dignitaries visiting Israel over the past 50 years. In order to provide the best possible service to the Peres Centre for Peace delegates, hotel staff remained on a 24-hour basis, including chefs, secretaries, typists and housekeepers. Each guest was provided with a personal valet for the duration of his or her stay.

In honor of the event, the hotel officially opened its newly renovated Penthouse Floor, containing its most important suites and deluxe apartments. The renovation cost was more than $1 million (US).

Until the end of February, hotel guests are entitled to receive a free car rental (excluding insurance) for each room-night at $120 (including breakfast). Hotel Eldan Jerusalem will sell directly to its target population in the same way that Eldan Rent A Car has done for years. THE WAR TO END ALL WARS

Morley Torgov returns to the colorful small town milieu he evoked in A Good Place to Come From and The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick.

In The War to End All Wars, two Jewish men who fought against each other in World War I meet again in small town USA. Now they are fighting another war--this time as business competitors and suitors. Their rivalry, both in commerce and in love, is complicated by their Jewishness in a largely non-Jewish world, and by the intrusion of Prohibition gangsters into their local battle.

TU B'SHVAT CONCERT AT BETH TIKVAH

Looking for a way to beat the mild depression that often comes as February approaches? Here's just the thing. Musica Beth Tikvah is billing its upcoming Shabbat Shira-Tu b'Shvat concert as "a sure-fire prescription for beating the winter blahs."

On Feb. 1 at 8 p.m., six musicians present an exuberant evening of Israeli folk songs and contemporary music by Korngold, Gershwin, Greenberg and Beth Tikvah's own Srul Irving Glick.

The performers are Tracey Atin, soprano; Simon Wynberg, guitar; Ric Moor, clarinet; Catherine McKeever, contralto, and Matthew Kulbacki and Elizabeth Acker, piano. $18 in advance, $20 at the door. Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave. 221-3433.

Jewish Book of Days: One way to learn more about Shabbat Shira and Tu b'Shvat is to look them up in Jewish Days: A Book of Jewish Life and Culture Around the Year, by Francine Klagsbrun, published recently by Noonday ($26.95).

Shabbat Shirah, the Sabbath of Songs, takes its name from the joyous songs of divine praise that welled up from the hearts of the Children of Israel after their safe passage across the Red Sea when they escaped the Egyptian army that had been in chase.

Tu b'Shvat, of course, is a sort of Jewish Arbor Day, and Jewish Days summarizes the distinctive place that trees hold in the Jewish imagination: "Adam and Eve were banished from the Garden of Eden because they ate from the tree of knowledge. Although that tree and the tree of life remained standing in paradise, cherubim and fiery swords guard the portals so that humans can never re-enter and achieve immortality. Instead, the Torah itself has come to be seen as a tree of life, offering 'length of days' for 'those who grasp her' (Proverbs 3:16, 18)."

Jewish Days takes the reader through the Hebrew calendar, discussing festivals, certain biblical events for which tradition has assigned dates, and historical events such as the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 and the death of the great scholar Moses Maimonides in 1204.

Adorned by Mark Podwal's simple and witty illustrations, the book is an engrossing and readable celebration of the particularities of Jewish life and culture.

While it is of the same genre as Every Day Remembrance Day, Simon Wiesenthal's powerful daybook of anti-semitic persecutions and pogroms down the ages, Jewish Days is not a yahrzeit catalogue, though it takes pains not to neglect the sadness and destruction within our history.

Books & Bagels: Ben Schlesinger, a professor of social work at the University of Toronto, has made a careful study of the pressures faced by growing numbers of middle-aged people faced with caring for both children and elderly parents. Schlesinger reads and discusses his latest book, The Family Squeeze: Surviving the Sandwich Generation (co-written with Suzanne Kingsmill) at the Books & Bagels literary event, Bloor JCC, Jan. 31, 11 a.m. Members $8, non-members $8. 924-6211.

Dance Troupe Honored: Dancers in the Canadian Children's Dance Theatre were among the honorees of a Doin' the Right Stuff human rights youth contest sponsored by a group of Torontonians marking the 50th anniversary of the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights of Dec. 10, 1948.

The young dancers' interpretation of Carol Anderson's Sephardic Songs won the award in the senior performance category. Sephardic Songs was created in commemoration of a specific massive abuse of human rights – the 1492 expulsion of the Jews from Spain.

Harduf Hebrew Dictionary: News has reached us, as though by breathless messenger, of the recent publication of the seventh volume of Harduf's Transliterated English-Hebrew Dictionary, which focuses on the letters P to Q of the English alphabet.

The compiler is David Mendel Harduf, the well-known Toronto scholar whose previous pocket-size Yiddish-English English-Yiddish dictionary has become a mainstay of modern Yiddishists.

Harduf's latest project, which was typeset in Israel and printed in Canada, has no shortage of approbations. "Harduf follows and supplements Eliezer Ben Yehudah's 16-volume Complete Dictionary of Ancient and Modern Hebrew," according to the 1995 American Reference Book Annual, while the 1998 Annual calls his dictionary "an important contribution to Hebrew lexicography."

What distinguishes Harduf's Transliterated English-Hebrew Dictionary is its use of "numerous quotations and examples of the correct Hebrew usage, drawn from various classical Hebrew sources." The dictionary is printed on "special fine paper" and features "spacy margins" and other "esthetic qualities" – so we are informed in a press release elegantly penned by noted Yiddish poet-literateur Simcha Simchovitch of Toronto.

The new volume, as well as its predecessors, may be ordered from Harduf Books, 11 Plum Treeway, Willowdale, Ont. M2R 3J1.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fifth annual Purim Art Contest .

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 25. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 11, 1999. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 18, 1999.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 25, 1999. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

A Native American adventure

By JOSIE NEWMAN PROVOST
Special to The CJN

The circle of women moved around and around in a shuffling dance, which is said to increase female fertility. It was one of a number of dances on a June evening, underneath a wooden pavilion in the woods where 45 people, mostly women, had gathered to learn about native American culture and spirituality.

The dancing was mingled with chants and story-telling led by a group of seven Mohawks in full traditional dress, who live on a reserve near the American-Canadian border. That was followed by a number of unique American games. A fire glowed behind the Mohawks, and dusk turned into darkness as they told stories about the history of their people.

The three-day program, held in the woods of a Christian campground in upstate New York, was hosted by Journeys into American Indian Territory. The group is run by Robert Vetter, an anthropologist who lived with, and was eventually adopted into, a Comanche family in Oklahoma – his adopted grandfather was the Comanche peoples' last medicine man.

Vetter says the time he spent with the Comanches changed his life because it made him more aware of the inter-relationship of everything in the natural realm, such as people, animals, plants and nature. He says the goal of his organization's programs, which run from three days to two weeks in length, is for both natives and participants to share who they are and establish friendships.

"The social and emotional aspects of these programs are most important, while the cerebral and intellectual are secondary," he says.

Judging from the comments of people participating in a variety of workshops such as native songs and dances, the social, emotional and spiritual aspects are the main reason why most participants come.

One woman, who started off with an angry, defensive attitude, seemed softer by the end of the weekend, saying she'd gained some of the inner peace she'd been seeking through the close interaction and teaching.

A variety of workshops and lectures completed an all-around picture of native culture. One of the most interesting of these was a history of the Arawak Indians given by Uailo, a half-Arawak/half-Italian man raised in Puerto Rico. Uailo said that hundred of years ago, the Arawaks travelled from Central America up to the Lesser and Greater Antilles, settling in Puerto Rico, Cuba and Jamaica. They integrated with another tribe and became the Tainos.

In the late 1500s, most of them were tortured and slaughtered by the Caribes, a people of Spanish Mayan Indian ancestry.

Although American history books say there are no Arawaks left, there are about 1,000 living in the United States. Those who weren't slaughtered by the Caribes, were sent to pineapple fields in Hawaii, north to Alaskan coal mines or to shoe factories in Manchester, N.H. There are several thousand more Arawaks of Taino descent living in Central America.

More dancing and poetic story-telling about the six nations of the Iroquois confederacy was done by the seven visiting Mohawks, whose tribe makes up one of the six nations. One of these Mohawks teaches native culture and traditions to elementary school children in Upstate New York.

Vetter says his concepts for Journeys originated from a trial program he ran with the Comanches in Oklahoma in 1987. At the end of the week-long program, natives and non-natives alike shared their thoughts. "One of the elders said he felt it was like the old days on the plains when the natives exchanged ideas with one another and with the white man. Unfortunately, society has influenced natives to abuse and manipulate those traditions, which is why most native bands now have a tribal chairman and tribal council," says Vetter.

Journeys Into American Indian Territory offers programs year-round in Oklahoma, Arizona, New York and other states. Prices start at $370 for a three-day program, all expenses included. Transportation to the program site is not included.

Montreal teen pursues soccer career in England

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — How does a laid-back Jewish kid from the Montreal suburb of St. Laurent end up heading towards a professional soccer career in England, where the sport is a virtual religion?

Adam Braz does it with talent.

Braz is a former Herzliyah High School student now playing for the under-19 team in Bristol City, about a two-hour drive from London.

Already ranked as one of Canada's top junior soccer players – he's a member of the junior Canadian national team which has competed in qualifying rounds for the Junior World Cup – Braz, 17, moved to England over the summer after Canadian junior team coach Tony Taylor recommended him to Bristol City.

Braz tried out twice for the Bristol squad, part of the top-ranked First Division, before being accepted, and he began training in September.

As a member of the under-19 farm squad, Braz might, by as early as May, be offered a professional contract and be on his way to being a bona fide member of the First Team, where every player wants to end up.

"It would mean a lot for me to get a pro contract," Braz said recently on his first visit back to Montreal since crossing the ocean. "It's what I've wanted my whole life."

Braz is definitely where he wants to be, but it hasn't necessarily been easy.

Beside the obvious cultural difficulties of having to adapt to life in England, Braz, who plays the defender position, also had to earn the respect of his teammates, who share the same dream of making the the pros.

Braz is one of only a few Canadians he's aware of currently playing soccer in England.

Being Jewish also makes Braz a bit of a rarity. He knows of at least three other Jewish professional soccer players in England, but at Bristol, he is the only Jewish member.

Braz has made it a point to seek out Jewish contacts in Bristol, something that's been made easier since the school he attends, Clifton College, has the only "Jewish house" – called Polak's House – in the entire English public school system.

Braz is boarding at Clifton, where he is studying business, and has found Polak's House a welcoming place to make Jewish friends.

Adam Braz

Braz knows playing in Bristol represents make it or break it time for him, but he copes with the pressure with an almost fatalistic calm.

"Basically, I do the best I can," he says with nonchalance. "I think I have a chance [to make the pros], but it's up to me to take that chance, to grab the opportunity."

Certainly, if Braz's record and determination are any indication, it would be unwise to bet against him.

Turned on to soccer at age seven by his father Roni, himself a former player who coached a house-league team, Braz loved the sport from the start, proving himself a true natural at the game.

He moved up the ranks year by year, becoming a member of the Quebec elite league, and at age 15 was named to the Canadian national junior team, a squad that came just short of qualifying for the junior World Cup.

Otmane Ibrir, who heads the Quebec Soccer Federation's Elite Program and once coached Braz, has been quoted as saying that Braz "has everything needed to go to the highest possible level."

But no one realizes more than Braz that, whatever he may have accomplished in the past, he must continue to improve and prove that he can play at the next level.

For example, Braz would like to improve his "heading game" and his positional play.

But no matter how much he wants to make the pros, Braz is definitely not one to obsess about it. He knows how to put soccer in perspective.

"I'm laid back about things," he says. "In life, you can't get too excited or too down. You've got to take things in stride."

Memorial hoops tourney set

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From Winnipeg to London (England), from Montreal to Miami, high school hoopsters will gather in Toronto for the third annual Israel Becker CHAT Invitational basketball tournament, Feb. 4-7.

Set to run at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, the tournament will bring together 350 players on 24 teams for a friendly, yet competitive, set of matches.

Divided equally between boys and girls teams, the tournament has grown so popular that event officials were forced to turn away several entries, said Aubrey Zimmerman, one of the tournament organizers.

In addition to a guaranteed four games per team, participants will enjoy a Shabbaton and be given "a chance to meet, interact and compete" with contemporaries from a variety of Jewish schools, he said.

The tournament is named in honor of Israel Becker, a CHAT basketball player who was killed in an automobile accident.

Last year, CHAT boys and girls teams were runners-up to tournament winners, Ramaz High School from New York City. Other entries include: King Solomon High School, London, England; Bialik High School, Montreal; Hebrew Academy, Nassau County, N.Y.; Westchester Hebrew High School, N. Y.; Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, Winnipeg; New Jewish High School, Waltham, Ma.; Miami Hebrew Academy; Hebrew Academy of Montreal; Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak, Hamilton; Yeshiva Or Chaim, Toronto; Akiva Hebrew Academy, Merion, Pa; and New Atlanta Jewish Community High School.

Although the teams have been asked to pay their own way to Toronto, once here, they will be billeted with local families, and other arrangements will be taken care of, Zimmerman said.

Organizers are relying on donations from tournament supporters to raise the $25,000 needed to stage the event, he added.

Games get under way at 9 a.m. on Thursday, Feb. 4 with CHAT boys taking on the Hebrew Academy of Nassau County, while over in a second gym, Or Chaim tangles with Ramaz. CHAT girls' first game is at noon versus the New Jewish High School of Waltham. Championship games are scheduled for 1:30 p.m. on Sunday, Feb. 7.

The Inside Back

Canada's other dark chapter

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Not much excites historians more than musty, dusty, yellowing documents that have only recently been made public. Gerald Tulchinsky, among Canada's top Jewish historians, is no different. He's raring to play sleuth, for before him, sitting at the National Archives of Canada, are some 59,000 files contained in 1,800 cardboard boxes.

Transferred to the archives by a disbanded office called the Custodian of Enemy Property, the documents look like a treasure trove of information on yet another dark chapter in Canada's war-time history. Thanks to Irving Abella and Harold Troper, we know all too well, this country's none-is-too-many policy on Jewish immigration. Now, thanks to Tulchinsky and an Israeli academic, we'll know more about how Ottawa treated struggling immigrants during World War II, as well as those who sent cash and other valuables to Canada for safekeeping. At first blush, they simply fell under the rubric "enemy aliens" – a threat to the Dominion.

The previously inaccessible documents, made public by the Department of Finance in 1995, show how much power the Custodian of Enemy Property had during the war – power over the financial affairs of anyone connected to Axis countries: Italy, Germany, Japan, and later, eastern Europe. In other words, all territory that was overrun by the Nazis, or by their war partners.

And the scope of that power cut a huge swath, ranging from seizure of bank accounts, insurance policies and property held by residents of enemy or occupied countries; controlling the assets of Japanese- and Italian-Canadians interned during the war; and sometimes, right down to seizing possessions and businesses.

How do Jews fit in?

Under war-time legislation, the few Jews who did manage to gain entry to Canada were, at least in the war's early stages, lumped in with non-Jewish enemy aliens, until they were afforded more lenient treatment later as refugees. Jews who sunk their savings into Canada but who lived in Axis countries were out of luck.

As the Globe and Mail's Jan Wong put it recently, Ottawa's bloodless bureaucrats punished the victims of the Nazis for the sins of the Nazis.

Tulchinsky, who teaches a course on the Holocaust at Queen's University in Kingston, has teamed with Yossi Katz, a geography professor at Bar-Ilan University. For the past few years, Katz has been looking into a story that caused waves in Israel a few years ago. Newspapers there unearthed documents showing that some banks, including a few going back to the British mandate, inherited assets deposited by people in war-time Nazi-held countries, assets that were never claimed.

And Katz has a keen interest in Canada, because one of the files at the National Archives details the case of a Hungarian Jew, Akatiu Somogyi, who went through a bureaucratic hell trying to retrieve his life savings of $3,500 he had sent to the Bank of Montreal on the eve of World War II. In 1957, Somogyi, then 70, enlisted the aid of Israel's embassy in Ottawa, to no avail. The money had already been transferred to the Bank of Canada as an inactive account. The final insult came in 1975, when Somogyi's daughter was denied the money because her father never proved to Ottawa's satisfaction that he had been persecuted.

Tulchinsky can barely hide his contempt at this.

"After the war," he explains, "many people came forward with claims, but they were met by bureaucrats who needed proof of suffering." A tattoo from Auschwitz, evidently, wasn't enough.

"Now it could be," he goes on diplomatically, "that in light of the more humane attitudes of today, these claims might now be settled on a more generous basis."

He suggests that lawyers connected to Canadian Jewish Congress or B'nai Brith may wish to provide their services, pro bono, to the descendants of claimants.

Tulchinsky, author of the recently released Branching Out: The Transformation of the Canadian Jewish Community and the earlier Taking Root: The Origins of the Canadian Jewish Community, senses there's another book here. Sounds like it could be a literary first: a mystery/tragedy.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am writing to you about my future mother-in-law. She is 80 years old and lives alone. She also has Alzheimer disease and is quite confused. Her children live out of town most of the year, but she is supported by family and friends. Lately, she is becoming much more hostile and aggressive, and I am quite concerned that she is putting herself in danger. I don't know if she is seeing a doctor. My future husband has arranged for me to come into town next week to see what I can do about organizing services for her.

AS

Dear AS,

It sounds as if your future mother-in-law is very lucky to have friends around her who are providing support. However, most people who have Alzheimer disease deteriorate over time, and it seems timely for her to be involved in a psycho-geriatric service at a local hospital.

Many agencies across Canada and the United States have care management programs that should be of assistance to you in helping you to support your future mother-in-law. This type of service can be organized when you are in town.

They can provide regular visits and supports to your future mother-in-law, communicate with you and your fiance about her progress, and actually be the hands-on service helping her when you are out of town.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

What are you laughing at?

An assimilated Jewish woman from the Midwest is visiting Philadelphia and gets on a bus.

A few stops later, a man with a wide-brimmed black hat, white shirt, long black coat and a long curly black beard gets on and sits down beside her.

The woman looks at him with disgust. "Jews like you," she hisses at him, "give us all a bad name."

He looks up at her, puzzled, and says, "I beg your pardon madam?"

She says, "Look at you. All in black, a beard, never take off your hat!

"It's Jews like you that give the rest of us a problem!"

He says calmly, "I beg your pardon, madam, but I am not Jewish. I'm Amish."

The woman looks back and smiles, "How nice. You've kept your customs."

Dispute sours Auschwitz trip

CJC criticizes Canadian-Polish Congress

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The prime minister's visit to Auschwitz has been "soured" by a disagreement between the Canadian-Polish Congress and the Prime Minister's Office (PMO), a key participant on the trip suggested last week.

Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), said he is "puzzled and surprised" by the position taken by the Canadian-Polish Congress (CPC). "It upset me that the tail end of this trip has to have a sour note. It's unfortunate."

Ronen, accompanied by his father Mordechai, a survivor of Auschwitz, joined Jean Chrétien in a visit to the death camp established during World War II by Nazi Germany. The "private" visit took place during the prime minister's official visit to Poland.

In a news conference in Toronto, CPC president Lucien Conrad said he was "deeply disappointed with the exclusion of representatives of the CPC during Chrétien's visit to Auschwitz.

"We are particularly dismayed by the insensitivity demonstrated by the PMO. The CPC feels the inclusion of a Polish Canadian delegation during the prime minister's visit to Auschwitz would have been a singular opportunity to promote better understanding between Canada's ethno-cultural communities, specifically members of Canada's Jewish and Polish minorities."

"Personally, I was very hurt that my prime minister would go to my country of origin and not notify us that he's going to the place where my grandfather was killed," said Ala Gettlich, secretary-general of the CPC.

Both Polish leaders emphasized that they had no quarrel with the Deportation decision

MONTREAL — A Federal Court judge has ruled that alleged Nazi war criminal Vladimir Katriuk lied to obtain Canadian citizenship. The decision paves the way for the federal cabinet to strip the 77-year-old Ukrainian-born beekeeper of his citizenship and begin deportation proceedings.

Government lawyers alleged that Katriuk was a member of the Waffen SS and a section leader of Shuma 18, a police battalion that committed atrocities in then-Byelorussia, including rounding up 100 Jews and burning them to death in a barn.

Katriuk entered Canada in 1951 under a false name.

Zundel's Lawsuit Dismissed

OTTAWA — An Ottawa judge has dismissed a lawsuit against political parties and their leaders launched by Toronto pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel. Justice James Chadwick threw out Zundel's claim against Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and other party leaders and politicians, ruling there was no reasonable cause of action and that the dignity and integrity of Parliament must be preserved. Zundel launched the $2.25-million suit after being banned from Parliament last June, where he had scheduled a press conference.

Last week, Gilbert Parent, the Speaker of the House of Commons, banned Doug Christie, Zundel's lawyer, from all parliamentary precincts.

CJC Condemns Atrocity

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress has condemned the Jan. 15 massacre of civilians in the village of Racak in Kosovo.

In a letter to Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy, CJC stated: "The ongoing carnage, dislocation of population and destruction of property due to the conflict in Kosovo are in direct violation of the UN-brokered ceasefire. Canada and the international community cannot accept the continued disregard for basic human rights."

CORRECTION

TORONTO — Errors in last week's story on the expansion of Pardes Shalom cemetery misled readers on the buyer and seller of 200 acres of rural property in York Region.

In fact, the land was purchased from a private company with Jewish communal dollars.

The CJN regrets the errors.

Wallenberg Park

JERUSALEM — Thirty haredi men have joined the Israeli army. It was the first such group to enlist after the Supreme Court ruled in December that a decades-old arrangement exempting yeshiva students from serving in the army is illegal. The 30 recruits will be part of a unit that combines Torah study with army service.

Jackson Goes to Shul

JOHANNESBURG — Pop superstar Michael Jackson recently attended a bar mitzvah here. Jackson, wearing a kippah, surprised congregants in the Sandton synagogue when he turned up for the bar mitzvah of Dean Cohen last month. Cohen's family apparently struck up a friendship with the singer when the family spent a weekend at the popular Sun City hotel and gaming resort three years ago.

Insurance Company Faces California Lawsuit

LOS ANGELES — In a precedent-setting decision, a Los Angeles judge has ruled that European companies can be sued in California courts for non-payment of life insurance policies dating back to the Holocaust era.

The decision that Assicurazioni Generali must face trial here may also be applied to other European insurers and more than 6,000 Holocaust survivors living in California, officials said.

The ruling stems from a $135-million lawsuit against Italy's largest insurance firm, launched by attorney Lisa Stern. She filed the action a year ago on behalf of relatives descended from Moshe Stern, a wealthy Hungarian wine and spirits merchant who perished at Auschwitz but who had taken out large insurance policies through Generali's Prague office.

In her ruling, the judge rejected the firm's assertion that it is not subject to the jurisdiction of a California court in a matter originating in a foreign country.

A trial date is to be set March 25. Generali officials said they will appeal the judge's ruling.

Criteria set for recipients of Swiss funds

We'll distribute the money as fast as we can: Rabbi Plaut

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Criteria have been established for Holocaust survivors in Canada to be eligible for a one-time payment under the Swiss fund of $2.5 million (US).

Applicants must meet all the following criteria. They must:

- have lived in a country under a Nazi regime;
- be in need;
- be a citizen of Canada; and
- be living at the time of application.

No funds are provided for families of deceased relatives.

If all 16,000 to 18,000 survivors estimated to be in Canada applied, each would receive about $130. However, since the question of need is being left up to the conscience of each survivor, the payout might be larger.

No date has been set for the cut-off of applications, which are not yet ready because the Swiss money has not been received. The Canadian plan for distribution, already approved by the World Jewish Restitution Organization, is to be put before Swiss authorities in mid-February.

"We'll do it [distribute the money] as fast as we can," said Rabbi Gunther Plaut, chair of a national committee that will disburse the funds.

"Every day is crucial, considering the age of the survivors. We've probably missed the majority of survivors already. As soon as we get approval, we'll send out applications to responsible Jewish agencies. We're looking for a broad distribution," Rabbi Plaut said.

In the meantime, a hotline for information, 1-877-252-6555, has been set up for those outside Montreal. It is an automated, free telephone number.

In Montreal, the number for the Swiss Fund Canadian Centre is 514-931-7531.

Rabbi Plaut said he hopes survivors will be able to get their applications quickly from Jewish organizations. Enough time will be allowed before a deadline so that all can apply, he said.

He hopes that most survivors will not have to write away for their applications.

A country under a Nazi regime can also mean a country under Nazi occupation or under the regime of Nazi collaborators.

Although the question of need is a matter of conscience, the official criteria define need this way: the applicant, whether living at home or in an institution, has financial difficulties meeting his or her basic needs, such as housing, food, clothing and additional health care.

A citizen can also mean a permanent resident or other legal resident of Canada.

'The best posssible service'

He walks into a room somewhat bashfully. One is immediately struck by his youthful appearance. In fact one could easily mistake him for a precocious, inquisitive university student and not the insightful, even audacious university professor of constitutional law that he is.

Stéphane Dion, president of the Privy Council and minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, was in Toronto last week to speak to students at the University of Toronto.

The timing of the talk by Dion was interesting because as he was addressing the students in Toronto, his federal and provincial colleagues were doing "social union" battle in Victoria.

As the bearer of the inter-ministerial portfolio, Dion was obviously very interested in the progress of the Victoria talks. He alluded to them several times in his presentation. However, the lead federal ministry in the discussions is the Department of Justice and the lead federal minister is the minister of justice, Anne McLellan.

Dion entitled his presentation: Are we moving beyond our constitutional obsession? He defined constitutional obsession as "the false belief that the existence of a strong separatist movement in Canada is proof that the country's constitution does not work and that it must be completely overhauled if the country is to survive."

He spoke of the need for government to bring forward the very best social and fiscal policies for reasons other than trying to repair our constitution or appease Quebec.

Moreover, and more to the key point that he wanted to deliver, he believed that the separatist cause in Quebec is waning decidedly more than before.

"There is increasing agreement that our constitution does 'work,' even though it could work better. The solution to our political, economic and social problems and the promotion of the values we believe in does not require constitutional upheaval. We can see that separatist blackmail has never yielded anything positive for Quebecers or other Canadians, and that it is by deciding resolutely to stay together in full confidence that we will be better able to respond to the aspirations of all, including Quebecers."

Dion's language was bold and to the point. He presented his arguments forcefully, refreshingly unselfconsciously, with clear logic.

He said that moving past the policy of attempting to appease the "separatist blackmail" has yielded three beneficial results:

• We have a better understanding of the secessionist phenomenon in Canada.

The minister asserted that renewed federalism and sovereignty-partnership cannot coexist side by side.

• We are becoming more successful at distinguishing the secessionist phenomenon from other Canadian realities.

There are a number of important, even urgent problems in Canada that must be confronted. But, said Dion, solutions to the problems "must not be bargaining chips. Every proposal for constitutional change must be considered on its own merits, according to how it benefits Canadians."

• Because of the need to resolve a number of uniquely Canadian problems, it has made us "look at the division of jurisdiction and powers between the two orders of government in a much more tangible and productive way."

It is in this regard, namely in the division of jurisdiction, that Dion's remarks were most likely directed to his counterparts in Victoria.

"We are seeing more and more clearly that the value that should be at the centre of that reflection on jurisdiction is the quality of service to Canadians. And we are coming to realize that the division of public responsibilities must not be seen as a process of strict compartmentalization, of schoolyard turf wars. We realize that one of the advantages of a modern federation is to force governments to continually come up with new ways of cooperating, in interdependence." (Our emphasis)

Those are very strong words from the federal minister. They cut both levels of government.

But the minister went further. "The division of powers…must continually evolve, so as to keep giving Canadian taxpayers more for their money." Dion appeared to be suggesting a new, "consumer"-oriented, pragmatic federalism. He elaborated in his next sentence while speaking directly to the "soft separatists."

"For this to happen, the specificity of every province and the cultural and linguistic dimension must certainly be taken into account, but always with the goal of providing the best possible public service to citizens, wherever they live in Canada…(Our emphasis)

"I can assure you that the government of Canada…sees its relations with the provincial governments strictly from the viewpoint of services to Canadians…[I]n the current social union negotiations …we are trying to find the decision-making framework that is best suited to improving health and social policy."

As of this writing, that framework has not yet been found. One hopes that the various ministers in Victoria last week were also listening to the young president of the privy council, minister for intergovernmental affairs. For it is a certainty that Canadians in every province are interested in receiving "the best possible public service."

Yiddish language in great crisis, professor believes

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — So many of its speakers are dying off that the Yiddish language is in a state of great crisis, according to renowned Yiddishist, Prof. Dovid Katz, 35.

The future of Yiddish depends on a revamping of university Jewish studies departments so that more emphasis is put on spoken and written Yiddish, Katz said in a telephone interview from New Haven, Conn., where he is visiting professor of Yiddish at Yale University.

"One real master in Yiddish is more important than 1,000 sentimentalists who never speak Yiddish."

Ordinary Jews must take an interest in Yiddish heritage to preserve the language, he said. Otherwise, in 100 years, only the Chassidim around the world will be speaking it. By that time, Katz estimated that there will be one million Chassidim, because they are having large families.

"To my great regret, most university Yiddish departments are taking the lazy way out. A lot of the professors are betraying us by putting emphasis on English and speaking it instead of Yiddish."

The importance of university Yiddish departments in a revival of the language is underlined by the fact that "the only successes we have had have come from the universities," Katz said.

He said he was optimistic about the future of Yiddish, depending on what the Yiddish community does. However, "if we make a mess of it, there will be nothing."

For many years, Katz was a professor in the Jewish Studies Department of Oxford University, England, and his summer program in Yiddish there was attended by many leading Yiddishists from Toronto.

He is also well known for reviving interest in the history of the Jews of Vilnius, formerly Vilna, of Lithuania. A program he pioneered involving an exchange of students between Vilnius and Oxford is well underway. He will again conduct a summer program at Vilnius this year.

Born in Brooklyn, he said he has always been bothered by Jews who are not interested in Yiddish. He remembers a traumatic moment in Safed, Israel, when he was 3 years old, and his father, Menke, a Yiddish poet, was angrily reprimanded by a police official for speaking Yiddish instead of Hebrew.

Katz was in Toronto Jan. 31 to Feb. 5, where he lectured under auspices of the Centre for Jewish Studies, York University, inaugurating the Rabbi Nachman Shemen Yiddish collection of the Scott Library at York.

He also spoke at Beth Tzedec Congregation on the Last Jews of Belarus, and gave two lectures at York on his research on linguistic geography among the Jews of Belarus.

Former Christian minister finds way back to Judaism

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Tonica Marlow wanted to be Jewish. For a woman ordained as a Christian minister at the age of 21, that is not exactly what one would expect.

She remembers one day learning that it was Yom Kippur, and hearing the words over and over in her head: "It's Yom Kippur. All the Jews are in shul, and you aren't there."

Marlow, now known as Tova Mordechai, is married, the mother of three sons and a baby daughter, and living in Israel.

She related the story of her painful search for her Jewish roots at a recent meeting of the sisterhood of Chabad Lubavitch Synagogue of Markham.

Her father was a Pentecostal minister, and her mother an Egyptian Jew who had converted to Christianity along with her own mother.

"Since Christianity assumes you take the faith of your father, the fact that my mother was born Jewish didn't signify, and we never talked about it," Mordechai explained.

Mordechai was, however, aware that her mother was a convert. "They [Christians] were very proud of her. At international gatherings, they would introduce her, or call her up to the stage."

Together with her brother and sister, she had what she described as a very happy childhood, even though it was a very strict life. "I was raised as a good Christian girl – there was no TV, no radio, no social life outside the church, no secular literature."

She said she grew to respect the doctrines of Protestantism, and wanting to serve God from a very young age, she was sent to the Christian Theological Seminary in Nottingham.

This institution taught that "unless your spirit was broken, you wouldn't be good for a ministry."

Stressing that "this was not normal Christianity," Mordechai said the book of rules included such demands as instant obedience to authority; eating everything that was given to you, even if it was mouldy; and fasting one or more days a week. Often, students would get only four hours sleep.

"I thought that by enduring this, I would be a better person and get closer to God, so that I could make a lasting contribution to the world."

Tova Mordechai

After graduating as a minister, she was very active in the church, as a preacher and in spreading the message of Christianity.

Still, she said, for years she agonized over some force pulling her towards Judaism, a force that in spite of all her efforts, grew increasingly stronger.

'I had never experienced anything like that first Shabbat'

"I wanted to be with Jews, to see them. I couldn't understand why I was drawn to [Judaism]."

Until she was caught, she used to sneak out to a nearby Orthodox synagogue, where she was exposed to Jewish services. She found that "the more I went, the more I wanted to go."

Her life became almost a nightmare, she said, describing her "deep feelings of sadness... a vacuum, a void, an emptiness." She thought she was going crazy.

Finally, she decided she could no longer preach, no longer pray "to the Christian God." She realized that she had to leave, even though she had no money (everything she made went to the church) and no clear idea of where she was going.

"I decided that if I had to sleep in the gutter, I would, to find the true God."

With the help of a local Lubavitch rabbi, she went to live with a religious family in an affluent part of London. Her first Shabbat was electrifying.

After lighting her Shabbat candle, according to Lubavitch custom, she said "there was so much peace in my room, that I jumped back. Nobody had to tell me that the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob that I had been searching for for so long was here."

"I had never experienced anything like that first moment of my first Shabbat. It connects the most perfect part of the soul to God."

It was 17 years ago that "God brought me from a dark place to a beautiful one," she said.

She realized, she said, that if one is committed to a Jewish life, it "enhances the home, the environment, the whole world."

Mordechai urged those working with people far from Jewish observance to not "worry if the seed you plant doesn't seem to take root immediately," noting that she was 25 before she could accept the call back to Judaism.

In an interview before the program, Mordechai said she doesn't miss her previous life. "It's like changing from uncomfortable shoes to slippers . You don't realize how much your feet used to hurt you."

Her relationship with her parents is "respectful," she said, and with her siblings slightly more cordial. Her father, whom she praises as a "genuine Christian," thinks she and her family will burn in Hell, she said.

Although her mother is a faithful member of the church, Mordechai noted that when she was scheduled for life-threatening surgery, "she didn't pray Christian prayers, but said the Shema."

Mordechai has told her story in a book, Playing With Fire, which she said, to the chagrin of many in the audience, is out of print.

Shalom Food Project helps combat Jewish hunger

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Six years ago, Miriam Kalushner recognized the need to address the hunger problem in Toronto and founded the Shalom Food Project.

"A few volunteers met to study the problem and where we could be most helpful," Kalushner said. "We decided to do something within the Jewish community in the anti-hunger movement."

At the time Kalushner, a medical technologist who is active in social action issues, was a volunteer at FoodShare, a metro community agency involved with issues of hunger in the community.

She wanted to target children in her fight against hunger.

"I wanted to create a program to feed hungry children and to bring awareness of the problem," said Kalushner.

"Healing and respect start at the very beginning – with children. When we provide for them, we have the foundation for a healthy and supportive community."

After a few months of meetings, Kalushner said she and her group of volunteers hatched a plan for a Jewish response to hunger: They decided to run a breakfast club at Plaut Manor, a non-profit apartment building.

"I firmly believe that every child has the right to go to school having a good breakfast and warm clothes. It's a basic human right. We are diminished if we live in a society where this is denied them."

Miriam Kalushner (centre back row) with mothers and children at a breakfast provided by the Shalom Food Project.

In supplying a nutritional program for low income families, food became "a conduit for community development," she explained.

Two years ago, the volunteers were approached by a group of mother's in Toronto's west end who saw a great need for a breakfast program in their area. The members of the Shalom Food Project accepted.

Kalushner said that this program feeds more than 40 children and adults a hot breakfast daily and provides them with a packed lunch. The children are also given warm clothing.

"Warm mitts, gloves and hats are knitted by seniors with donated wool. We have established a clothing and furniture bank."

She noted that the supportive housing building where the Shalom Project runs breakfast houses many people under social-economic stress, among them, welfare recipients, victims of family violence and people with mental health problems.

"When the mothers come down for breakfast with their children, they are supportive of each other, and it provides them with an opportunity to socialize," Kalushner, said.

"We also employ two mothers as coordinators who work along with our team of loyal volunteers. They run the food program. This helps them get experience so they can get a job."

She added that the volunteers now assist participants with resumes.

"Giving people the tools to identify and satisfy their own needs is the highest form of tzedakah there is."

Volunteers from the Jewish community work with volunteers from the Runnymede United Church, reading to the children, doing arts and crafts, and socializing with them, she said.

She has also assisted other groups in establishing similar programs.

The Shalom Food Project board of directors was formed with volunteers "from all walks of life" who oversee operations, seek volunteers, obtain food and clothing donations and do fundraising, Kalushner said.

She told The CJN that the board hopes to expand the program."All we need is the means.

"Since the massive welfare cuts, I have seen a greater need for programs to feed the hungry."

The Shalom Food Project, which has a charitable donation number, will have its first fundraising musical afternoon and tea on May 16, Kalushner said.

The Yujjies are here

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yes, the Yujjies (young urban Jews, single or not) are packing them in on Sunday evenings.

For the last three months 200 or more of them have attended the highly informal question and answer sessions sponsored by Kolel: a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, at the Indigo Bookstore, at the Yonge-Eglinton Centre.

The next session, on Feb. 21, at 7.30 p.m., which is free as always, features guest speaker Baruch Browns Sienna, head of the Institute for Jewish Education through Technology.

Even people browsing the book shelves are apt to be attracted to the Yujjies get-togethers. "We are reaching a new group of people," said Shirley Herman of Kolel.

Whether it is the location, the Sunday-evening time, or the completely flexible definition of who is a young urban Jew that is attracting the crowds, Kolel is pleased with the result, Herman said.

Previous sessions with Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Kolel director, Selma Sage and Rabbi Daniel Komito Gottlieb, on subjects as diverse as gender differences, love stories and Jewish healing have brought the Yujjies out in full force.

"They're young, mostly 20s and 30s, out of college, but maybe not totally settled. Lots of them are single, but some are not," according to Rabbi Jeremy Schwartz, Kolel assistant director.

"Mostly they're not members of congregations, but some are. In general, they're looking for community and at Indigo you'll see them forming it before your eyes," he said.

Kolel is satisfied that a Yujjie living in Thornhill qualifies for the cafe gatherings, even though strident downtown Yujjies consider anything north of Eglinton "nose-bleed country," he said.

A feature of the evenings is the tendency of Yujjies to question and answer and question again, said Rabbi Schwartz.

The project has been aided by a grant from the Les and Minda Feldman Foundation.

Unconscionable and unforgivable

Two weekends ago, more than 500 people were turned away from emergency departments at a number of hospitals in Toronto and told to seek treatment elsewhere. The medical staff forced to send the patients away were being neither vexatious nor mischievous. They simply had no choice, overburdened by the volume of cases already in their care.

This "emergency" situation was not restricted to Toronto. Overcrowded emergency wards afflict many of the larger communities in the country.

In Quebec for example, Globe and Mail correspondent Rhéal Séguin recently reported, "hospitals in a number of communities have been overrun by a sudden increase in emergency cases... In recent weeks, patients have been treated in hallways and administrative offices because of bed shortage. Others have been turned away.

"A woman died in Trois-Rivières 12 hours after being admitted to an emergency ward. Her family says she did not receive proper care. In some hospitals, doctors and nurses have complained of being understaffed and overworked."

The sorry state of our emergency wards is part of the urgent backdrop for the run-up to the upcoming federal budget and to the social union talks underway between the provinces and the federal government. Yet we must await the finance minister's pronouncements on the extent of the increase, if any, to the health care allocations, even as we observe the closeted federal-provincial negotiations on a possible new social union.

Surprisingly, there seems to be no air of urgency surrounding the talks. Instead, our elected leaders seem to be embroiled in the usual political posturing, attempting to cobble together a new national scheme for transfer payments in a manner described by the media as "hardball bargaining." They appear to be exchanging as many old accusations as they are new ideas. Premier Mike Harris of Ontario was reported to have "blamed the federal government directly for many of the problems in the [Ontario] health care system, and said improvements depend on getting more money from Ottawa in the budget..."

Our leaders tend to forget that the public is not interested in political gamesmanship, in the predictable public pillorying of the "opposing" government.

The public is interested in solutions. The point of the current social union talks should not be to point a finger of blame. Rather, it should be to spawn substantive solutions of sound public policy that appropriately accommodate the stirrings of human conscience.

Canada is one of the most affluent countries on earth. We participate in the global economy at the cutting edge of commercial and scientific developments. Our standard of living and quality of life are unrivaled anywhere. We lack neither natural nor human resources.

How then, can we explain to ourselves, let alone to the individuals turned away by our hospitals, that we are unable to provide emergency medical treatment to every single person who requires it?

It is utterly unconscionable and unforgivable in the year 1999 that any hospital in Canada must refuse to render emergency, or indeed, any medical care to people in need.

In their haggling over just the right transfer formula, let our leaders be reminded that they must "not stand idly by the blood [distress] of their fellow human beings." (Leviticus 19:16)

If their consciences are so unmoved by the current state of the health care system that they cannot find a reasonable agreement reasonably soon, let them not be forgiven.

Her opposition to brit milah not anti-Semitic

Anti-Semitism is vile, and it is a horrible thought to contemplate oneself or others engaging in this. All of us who care about human rights and human ethics must also ensure that we do not act in any way that could be wrongfully used by others to promote anti-Semitism. If there is such a possibility, as is true in presenting the case against infant male circumcision, one needs very powerful justification. I believe I had such justification in writing the text that I did on infant male circumcision. With this in mind, I would like to respond to the letter from Dr. Joseph Berger. (CJN, Jan. 7)

It is precisely because anti-Semitism is so wrong that it is a very serious matter to label somebody anti-Semitic, as Dr. Berger has labelled me on the basis of his perception of my stance on infant male circumcision. Moreover, as one rabbi pointed out to me, labelling something which is not anti-Semitic as anti-Semitic does harm to the cause of eradicating anti-Semitism.

If Dr. Berger had read my paper, he would have known that I expressly addressed the valid concern that my views on infant male circumcision might be able to be used by people who wished to promote anti-Semitism. Because of my fears in this regard, I delayed speaking publicly on infant male circumcision for almost seven years after I first started to consider the ethical and legal issues it raises. I also discussed these fears with other people, including Jewish colleagues at McGill, who reinforced my concerns.

While many of the Jewish people with whom I spoke did not agree with my stance on infant male circumcision, they and the other people I consulted, agreed that there is a very important distinction between being anti-Semitic (which I would hate to be) and addressing the ethics of sensitive issues, such as infant male circumcision, that are intimately associated with the practice of the Jewish religion and Jewish identity. In other words, simply addressing these issues is not, in itself, anti-Semitism; rather, the person's motive in doing so and the approach that they take, will determine whether or not this is present.

Dr. Berger alleges that my motives in writing this paper were "antipathy and animosity" to the Jewish tradition. In assessing if he could be correct, it must be kept in mind that I work in the area of medicine, ethics and law, and that my paper was directed at the ethical and legal issues raised by infant male circumcision carried out by physicians, especially in view of recent medical research on the risks and harms of infant male circumcision. The vast majority of infant male circumcisions in North America – approximately 95 percent – are not carried out on Jewish infants or for religious reasons.

In short, my paper was not primarily directed at the religious practice of infant male circumcision, although I realized, of course, that in addressing infant male circumcision, in general, raising the issue of its religious practice was unavoidable. Therefore, I did discuss infant male circumcision for religious reasons, at some length, in the context of whether an exception allowing this could be established under current ethical and legal norms in Canada. Any person who had read this section would find it very difficult, in fact I believe impossible, to conclude that I had any anti-Semitic purpose in writing the paper.

Brewda family well known in Peterborough

I was delighted to read the story by Daniel Wolgelerenter on Charlie Brewda (CJN, June 7). What an inspirational story. I knew Charlie and his family when they lived here in Peterborough. They were always an inspirational family and contributed much to our Jewish community. We all were aware of Charlie's struggle, I especially, because I too struggled with Crohn's disease. I am so impressed with this story about Charlie and am so proud of him. He comes from a very good family and the whole family can inspire us all.

As if the King wrote, 'In case I don't come back'

By ZVI BAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Last week, on Monday night just past midnight, a letter King Hussein wrote to his heir, Prince Abdullah, was handed over to Jordanian television. Hussein, who until then had ordered Jordan TV not to show his picture with his brother Hassan during the festivities marking the king's return from cancer therapy at the Mayo Clinic, knew before his trip home that he needed to take quick action to deal with the succession.

He knew that while the results of the bone marrow transfers he received from his sister and brother (not Hassan, due to incompatibility) were positive, they were not a 100 percent guarantee that his cancer was conquered. The decision to go home to Jordan, even for only a few days, was a result of the need to immediately resolve the succession and prevent the break-up of the Hashemite family. He had heard rumors that there were plans to make personnel changes in the army, particularly to change the chief of staff, and to appoint new ambassadors. But what really angered the king were rumors coming from "sources close to Hassan" that carried slanderous suggestions about the behavior of the king's American-born wife, Noor, and their children.

Hussein isn't directly blaming his brother for the spread of the gossip, but was amazed by the changes Hassan wanted to make without consulting him. The expression coup d'état was never mentioned in the king's letter, but its spirit was there between the lines.

Hussein hoped that he would have enough time to hand over the kingdom to his son in an orderly, controlled process, and guarantee the support of all his family and especially Hassan himself. But three days ago, he found out that he doesn't have the time he would need, and he called in his brother to finish the process begun before he went back to the Minnesota clinic.

Prince Abdullah

According to reports from Amman, the two brothers sat together for seven hours. On the table between them was a letter from Hassan, written out of a deep sense of insult that he was being passed over after so many years of loyal service. According to one of the reports, Hassan asked Hussein for permission to leave Jordan, but that report was strenuously denied by the palace. At the end of the session, Hassan agreed to meet with Abdullah and to kiss him on his brow.

An orderly process

After such a gesture, the king allowed Jordan TV to show pictures of him embracing Hassan and Abdullah, as well as Hassan and Abdullah embracing each other. That image was especially important for Hussein to demonstrate to Jordanians that the dispute was over.

The next step was reading out the letter he wrote to his son, the new crown prince. The letter is much more than an appointment. It is an orderly command of the day, instructing the prince how to behave with the Jordanian people, the Hashemite family, the heads of the Bedouin tribes, the army and anyone else he encounters.

At the same time, the letter is a message to the Jordanian people telling them who to support. He lists the good characteristics of his son, and the letter includes an unexpressed wish that the people who support and love the king will support and love the son. The letter could have been titled, "In case I don't come back."

It is difficult to know how much longer Hussein has, and it appears that Jordan last week went through a dramatic transition from the naming of Abdullah not merely as the heir, but in fact as the new manager of the country.

King Hussein as he appeared in 1995.
[RNS/Reuters photos]

With a practically unlimited mandate from his father, Abdullah's struggle for the crown has ended and his struggle to survive has begun.

Theoretically, the 37-year-old Abdullah has the skills to run the country. He is a general in the army, commander of special forces and close to the chief of staff. He's intimately familiar with the Bedouin tribal structure and its political balances. Abdullah went to school in the United States and Britain, took a wide range of military courses, completed a degree at Oxford and a master's degree in political science at Georgetown University in Washington. He has been active diplomatically in the Arab world on behalf of his father and on occasion took part in state functions when his father and uncle were both out of the country. His friends and associates say he is quick-witted, pleasant and not at all patronizing. What is not known is how he will manage to run the country without the patronage of his father.

At this stage, it is reasonable to expect that the Hashemite family, including Hassan, will back Abdullah. That's the nature of the family that has managed to stay together despite internal disputes and private furies.

The army will back Abdullah, while the opposition, even the Islamic opposition, doesn't have the troops to threaten the regime. The most critical issue for Abdullah could well be the Palestinians in the refugee camps, who form the core of discontent in Jordan. On this issue, Israel's cooperation with Jordan on advancing the peace process could become a top priority. Israel, more than ever before, could become the most important ally for Jordan and for the survival of the royal family. In the eyes of the Arab world's leaders, once again Jordan has a young leader whose opinion will carry little weight. For that reason, Abdullah may need to wield power by having the right friends - Israel and the United States.

Israel feels Abdullah is ready to rule

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Senior sources in the Israeli defence establishment have said that although Jordan's King Hussein is deathly ill, newly appointed Crown Prince Abdullah is well-equipped to take the throne and preserve the stability of the Hashemite monarchy.

The sources said they had obtained information indicating that "the Jordanian establishment is strong enough to withstand the shock of the king's fatal illness and the rift between him and the deposed crown prince, Hassan."

But other defence sources who work with Amman said the situation in Jordan is serious and worrisome.

Israeli sources said Abdullah's internal standing in Jordan is strong, even though he is not experienced as a diplomat and has no real training in foreign policy matters.

Abdullah is strongly backed by the army, in which he serves as chief of special forces. Before being promoted to his new post just a heartbeat away from the throne, Abdullah had been touted as a likely candidate to be the next army chief of staff.

The relations of the crown prince with the chiefs of Jordan's security services are also considered especially close.

The big question, Israeli defence officials said, is what kind of working relationship Abdullah develops with his uncle Hassan, and how much Hassan does to help smooth the transfer of power to his nephew. The officials said Hassan would probably put country before ego, in light of the serious dangers facing the Hashemite Kingdom from within (chiefly possible tension with the majority Palestinian population), and from without (mainly possible threats from Syria or Iraq).

Newly appointed Israeli defence minister, Moshe Arens, held a meeting on the situation in Jordan yesterday, his first day on the job, conferring with senior adviser David Ivry and military intelligence chief Amos Malka.

Sources in Jerusalem also said they expected Abdullah would preserve Jordan's good relationship with Israel.

Meanwhile, on the streets of Amman, photographs of Hassan were taken down and replaced by images of Abdullah standing next to Hussein.

One Jordanian journalist said the feeling on the street was that "the king is not dead, but it is already possible to say 'Long live the new king.'"

Abdullah shook the hands of hundreds of well-wishers who came to greet him at the Raghadan Palace yesterday, demonstrating their loyalty to the king's new heir. Jordanian television broadcast scenes of handshakes and embraces for hours on end; newspapers were filled with pages of congratulatory ads.

Many were calling Abdullah "the Hashemite lion cub," and saying, "This cub is from the lion king." Abdullah is named for his grandfather, the Jordanian king who was assassinated at the Al Aksa Mosque on the Temple Mount in 1951.

Jordanian newspapers have also begun referring to Hussein as Abu-Abdullah – the father of Abdullah. Abdullah is also being called Abu-Hussein, for his oldest son.

No one is speaking publicly about the stability of the regime being in any way imperiled. People are voicing sympathy for Hassan, and praising him for the nobility he has shown in accepting his brother's decree.

An environmental friendly day

It's all about trees: a good way to describe Tu b'Shvat, which we celebrated this year on Feb. 1. A day before the groundhog forecast the length of winter, Israelis celebrated the festival of trees. Plant a tree, give money for trees, pray for rain to water the trees. Hug a tree.

Jennifer Fox in Halifax

Tu b'Shvat is the original environmentally friendly celebration.

When I was a child, each January my Hebrew schoolteacher would hand out to the class small white envelopes with green lettering – little envelopes to hold a little bit of money to pay for a little seedling in Israel. And each year, the teacher would remind the class why it was so important to plant trees in Israel. The country is a desert. Trees keep the soil on the ground, so that it is not swept into the air by a gust of wind.

That's all I remember, since ecology has never been an interest of mine. But I do remember the certificate I got when I bought a tree and how proud I felt knowing I had done a good thing.

Every kid who bought a tree dreamed of going to Israel and locating the tree that they paid for. I imagined a little plaque with my name on it lying at the foot of a tree in a forest of trees with little plaques. Somewhere in a country I had never visited was something of mine, something growing and flowering, because of my parents' and my generous donation, of course.

The other thing I remember about Tu b'Shvat from my three days a week of Hebrew education was praying for rain. Why would Israelis want rain anyway? Rain meant you had to stay in during recess, and you couldn't wear your favorite shoes, but had to have really clunky rain boots instead. Everything became grey when it rained, and the school bus took even longer to get me home. Why would anyone pray for rain?

Ten year-olds don't fully understand the repercussions of a dry spell for an already dry country. They don't realize that in Israel, January and February are considered the rainy season and the perfect time for planting. All 10-year old Canadians know is snow balls and snow forts, wearing layers upon layers of warm clothing and hoping for the snow to be so high school will be cancelled. On the other hand, kids and adults alike in Halifax hope and pray that the horrible freezing rain will stop, which will put an end to the dampness in their bones.

Tu b'Shvat is a Jewish version of Earth Day. It reminds us of the importance that plant life and vegetation have on a society. In Canada, we implement safeguard programs that will hopefully benefit the planet. Each household in Halifax is expected to compost food scraps, and Toronto has a thorough recycling program in place. If only Toronto had a program for dealing with excessive amounts of snow.

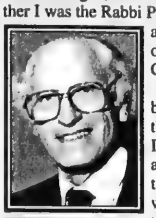
Two years ago, I was in Israel and personally planted my own tree.

That day, the importance of Tu b'Shvat was evident. It was May, and back home in Thornhill the grass was a lush green and my mother was in the process of planting her garden. In Israel the air was still and hot and the earth was brown. How could spring be so different from what I had always known? How hard it must be for this to be the land of milk and honey when it could be barren so easily.

Our tour group got off the bus and picked spots to plant tiny seedlings. I dug a small hole, said a blessing and deposited the soon-to-be tree into its home. Forty trees were born that day. I wonder how my tree is doing.

When yesterday became today

A few weeks ago, my wife received a telephone call from a woman called Magda, who wanted to know whether I was the Rabbi Plaut who some years ago, had the address of 25 Karlov Ave. in Chicago.



Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

That had indeed been the address of the synagogue where I served at the time, and my wife was able to confirm this. She was asked to convey to me that the caller was a former concentration camp inmate whom some American soldiers, I amongst them, had cared for at a crucial time in their lives. Having identified me at last, she was most anxious to see me once again.

Subsequently, we arranged for a time when we could get together – because Magda turns out to live in Hamilton – and finally we met. Needless to say, she would no longer have been able to identify the chaplain of the 104th Infantry Division whom she had seen 53 years ago, nor would I have been able to recognize her, who was then a 15 year-old girl. I took my book Unfinished Business, in which some chapters are devoted to my experiences in Germany during the war, and showed her my picture as a chaplain. She said, "That was you, as I remember you, and I have at last found you again!"

She had pictures of some of the other soldiers, but she said she had always wanted "to see the chaplain who was in charge, and who brought us food that we could eat. Before then, anything that could keep us alive passed our lips, but now that we were free we wanted to live as Jews once again, and kosher food would be a visible sign of our return." I in turn told her that none of us deserved any thanks, but in the end had to accept her grateful sentiments.

Our meeting, during which we were joined by her son and daughter, was, to put it mildly, filled with high emotion. Strange that it took so very long to get us together, for she never mentioned my name to her daughter, but only the experience – and her daughter had in fact taught Hebrew in our synagogue some years ago, but could never make that crucial connection.

Now that we had met, I had some time to think about it and turned once again to my book to see whether by any chance I had recorded our meeting with these girls. And indeed, I found the following entry. "This morning I visited a place where I found nine Jewish Hungarian girls aged 14 to 20 who had gone through the most harrowing experiences. They are simple, really nice kids – Orthodox and religious throughout all their untellable troubles. Without having access to a calendar they still kept the holy days as best as they could. After the liberation, the first thing they did was to fast in gratitude. They wouldn't let me go – we sang some Palestinian songs together, they danced the horah for me – I could have wept for their joy. We set them up beautifully. They now have clothes, good quarters and food."

"I could have wept for joy" – if I didn't do it then, I did it when we met again. Life takes strange turns, and it seems to me that the war and the Holocaust never leave me alone. Some memories are bad, but this one was not just good, it was wonderful in every way.

The summer job hunt begins

Are we really wanted here in Quebec? It's about that time of year when I start to look for something to do during the summer. Many application deadlines for summer internships are in mid-February, and the cold is just so hard to take that dreams of warmer summer days are hard to avoid.

Erica Horn in Montreal

I have been mailing innumerable cover letters and resumes to newspapers and television stations in the United States. I am also applying to be a madrichah on an Israel trip, and on a back burner is the option of being a camp counsellor in Pennsylvania. Despite all of these enchanting opportunities I have discovered, there is a trend I have come to realize. I have not even looked into any possible internships in Montreal. My rationale is that I spend enough time here already. It's not like the Expos are saving me a seat at each of their games. Oops, I almost forgot, the Olympic Stadium has had to issue a warning: Enter at own risk – falling snow, ice, fiberglass and cables!

Hidden deep within is another reason I have very little interest in spending my summer working here: my French. Don't misunderstand me, mon français est bon et je peux communiquer en français mais je préfère l'anglais (ou même l'hébreu). If offered the opportunity to work in the United States, where I can perfect my skills in time for next year's advanced Spanish course, visit a new city and meet new people, why should I choose to remain here and work on my French?

It's ironic that I have every intention of living in Montreal. I'll have the rest of my life to brush up my French; therefore, am I wrong to leave it as second fiddle this summer?

I am essentially being forced to focus on two distinct yet crucial aspects of my future at one time: what I do and where I live. Suppose I opted to remain here this summer, thus suggesting that where I live is slightly more important than what I do, what would I do here?

The way in which I have found prospective internships has been via endless Internet searches. (Thank goodness for unlimited usage!) Interestingly, the only options that have appeared on my screen have been located in the United States. Why is that? Even leafing through the McGill newspapers I have yet to come across any remotely intriguing summer job opportunities in Montreal. Why is that? Is there really a future for us here?

Having attended a day school for over 12 years where French was taught alongside English, why is it that at the age of 20, I am not equally as comfortable in French as I am in English? Is it costing me my future in Montreal?

There are two issues being raised here. The first is how the French factor may be causing many 20-somethings to look west of the province and south of the border for summer opportunities, thus abandoning the possible improvement of their French and leading to the potential sacrifice of their stable futures in Montreal. The second issue is that the province seems to be lacking in opportunities, or if they do exist, then they are not as well publicized as they should be. Actually, I take that back: We all know the Big O is now hiring. If you want a summer job there, I am sure they'd pay you any sum of money just for entering the (I hesitate to say building) mass of concrete.

I suppose this column is good exposure for many of my friends and myself. You now know we are on the lookout. Approchez-nous. Reconvince us that we are right to want to stay.

Jewish partisans fought the Nazis

"The ghetto means death. Provide yourself with arms, leave the ghetto and take to the forests!" – Hersh Smolar.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

During World War II, when millions of Jews were being ruthlessly murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators, Jewish partisans were engaged in a deadly struggle with the German army. The battlefields stretched from eastern Poland, Belorussia and the Ukraine to the western part of the Soviet Union and the three Baltic states.

This relatively little-known facet of the Holocaust has been addressed by a handful of writers. But with Fugitives of the Forest (Stoddart), Winnipeg historian Allan Levine has taken the topic to greater heights.

As far as he knows, Fugitives of the Forest is the first book which tells that story in a popular and comprehensive fashion for the general reader.

Previous books, such as Defiance: The Bielski Partisans by Nechama Tec and Jewish Resistance in Nazi-Occupied Eastern Europe by Reuben Ainsztein, focused on specific locales or were written in a scholarly fashion. Levine's work, on the other hand, is not only wide-ranging but eminently accessible.

And in an original touch, Fugitives of the Forest also examines the partisan movement from Germany's vantage point, a feat Levine was able to achieve after studying German documents in the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

Levine, who was here recently on a publicity tour, said that his overarching objective was to show how these partisans survived despite the overwhelming odds against them.

By his estimate, there were 20,000 to 25,000 Jewish partisans out of a grand total of about 250,000 partisans, as well as 10,000 Jews in family camps, usually attached to Soviet and Polish fighting units.

They faced a litany of obstacles: hostility from the local population, a dearth of food supplies, a lack of shelter, and the ravages of disease and lice. Given the difficult conditions, it is hardly surprising that at least half of the fighters died, he noted.

Levine, 42, was inspired to write the book by family friends. He singled out two persons, Gitel Morrison, who was a member of Tuvia Bielski's legendary family camp and whose son, Jeff, is married to Levine's sister, Shayla, and Ben Lungen, a Red Army veteran and former Soviet partisan whose son, Paul, is on the reporting staff of The Canadian Jewish News.

Listening to Morrison's and Lungen's amazing tales of survival, Levine knew he had to pursue the matter. But it percolated in his mind for five years before he decided to do something about it.

In the meanwhile, Levine – a history teacher at St. John's-Ravenscourt School and a freelance writer – pursued far different projects.

As adept in non-fiction as fiction, he wrote The Exchange: 100 Years of Trading Grain in Winnipeg, among other works, and The Blood Libel, a mystery which was shortlisted for the Chapters/Books in Canada First Novel Award.

When Levine was finally ready to deal with the subject of Jewish partisans, he applied for, and received, grants from the Canada Council and the Manitoba Arts Council. Without these funds, the research process for Fugitives of the Forest could not have got off the ground.

Thanks to leads from Morrison and Lungen, Levine interviewed more than 60 former partisans in Canada, the United States and Israel. And in North American and Israeli libraries and archives, he pored over secondary and primary sources.

Levine, whose parents are not Holocaust survivors, recalled that the interviews were emotionally taxing. "Not one of them ended without tears on both sides."

Levine, who holds a PhD in Canadian history from the University of Toronto, spent three years researching and writing The Fugitives of the Forest. A fine book but by no means a definitive one, it pulls together the disparate strands of a complex and, at times, a heart-rending story.

Based on his findings, Levine reaches the conclusion that Jews from rural localities had a better chance of surviving in the forest than Jews from cities. He quotes Holocaust scholar Yisrael Gutman: "The East European urban Jew was full of fear of strangers and wild animals and was put off by the difficulties of climate and nature. The Jews of the villages near the forests and the swamps did not share these fears."

Be that as it may, the escapees faced tremendous obstacles, ranging from police patrols to collaborators. In the region south of Lublin, Poland, for example, approximately 20,000 Jews escaped into the forest in 1942, but the vast majority were hunted down and murdered.

The Nazis exacted swift and harsh punishment against anyone caught helping Jews. And while this was certainly a deterrent, peasants who failed to assist Jews tended to be anti-Semitic or simply indifferent to the Jews' fate.

In describing the peasants' attitude, Levine is careful not to jump to hasty conclusions. Many, he states, regarded Jews with anti-Semitic disdain and often considered them Communists and pests. But a considerable number risked everything to save them. Of these, some were motivated by profit, and others by kindness. But even good-hearted people, afraid for their families, squelched their humanitarian instincts.

In any event, the transition from fugitive to partisan was not an easy one. Age, physical endurance and military experience were the key factors. The vast majority of escapees were not prepared for the privations of the forest, and thus succumbed. In addition, the fugitives could never be certain how Soviet and Polish partisans would relate to them.

It was official Soviet policy not to allow the plight of the Jews to detract from the war effort. As a result, there were cases in which Soviet partisans refused to protect Jewish men, women and children. However, many Soviet commanders helped Jews, and integrated them into combat units. Levine acknowledges that Tuvia Bielski's family camp in the Naliboki Forest owed its survival to a Belorussian brigade.

Still, as he points out, there was a notion among the Soviets that Jews were and always would be poor partisans. Courageous Jewish partisans like Yeheskel Atlas and Chil Grynszpan, whose stories Levine relates at length, disproved that jaundiced theory, but it persisted.

Allan Levine

And, of course, Jews who linked up with partisans were usually dogged by subtle and/or blatant anti-Semitism from their comrades-in-arms. In this connection, Levine claims that the Polish Home Army, known as the AK, generally displayed a "less than positive" attitude toward Jewish partisans.

By any yardstick, the partisans did not affect the outcome of the war. Their attacks against railways, bridges and bases were really nothing more than pinpricks. Nevertheless, the Nazis considered them serious and pesky foes. In the summer of 1943, Hitler appointed one of his most trusted generals, Erich von dem Bach-Zelwski, to eradicate them.

Supported by reconnaissance aircraft, thousands of German soldiers launched a campaign of annihilation. And while numerous partisans, including Jewish ones, were killed in these brutal and merciless sweeps, the Germans were never quite able to eliminate them as a factor.

Music of the Crypto-Jews

By AVI BENLOLO

Ethnomusicologist Judith Cohen has made several trips over the past few years to Spain and Portugal to study the musical traditions of Crypto-Jews.

Sometimes referred to as "secret" or "hidden" Jews, Crypto-Jews are descendants of Conversos who have kept identifying as Jews, but have lived as Catholics since the Spanish Inquisition.

Armed with grants from York University, the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, Cohen, who teaches at York University, has visited many different villages and communities along the border regions of Spain and Portugal. She has interviewed both Crypto-Jews and non-Jews about their musical traditions.

She feels she has gained the trust and confidence of some Crypto-Jewish families, enabling her to make some observations about their musical traditions and their lives in general.

Cohen finds that their musical traditions are largely those of the areas they live in, rather than being specifically Crypto-Jewish.

She says they have a couple of Portuguese songs specifically relating to Jewish themes, which seem to be relatively recent compositions; they also have many prayers along with some biblical ballads in Portuguese.

While in earlier generations the prayers and ballads may have been sung, for some time now they have been mostly recited without music.

Cohen notes that whatever Jewish songs and prayers they do know were taught to them by Jewish travellers or by rabbis posted in the area. In fact, during Passover 1997, Cohen herself taught several Belmonte Crypto-Jews a Moroccan version of Chad Gadya/Un Cabrito, which she had learned from Sephardim in Montreal.

Cohen explains that there are various reasons which may account for the lack of a repertoire of local Portuguese Crypto-Jewish songs. First, melodies rarely survive intact for centuries. In the case of Judeo-Spanish songs, there are many instances of texts enduring for centuries even though the melodies have changed.

Second, the secret life Crypto-Jews had to endure simply made it difficult for melodies to last. In fact, they are known to recite numerous prayers and blessings in a very low voice, rapidly, so that they may be almost indecipherable if one is not familiar with them.

According to Cohen, Crypto-Judaism was essentially a women's religion. Many of the men were itinerant peddlers who were frequently away for long periods of time, because travel in that era was difficult. More significantly, the secrecy of Crypto-Jews meant that it was a "domestic religion," since it was mainly carried out in the home.

A further observation made by Cohen is the recent occurrence of Sephardi festivals in some Spanish towns. These festivals take place in towns of the Camino de Sefarad (Road of Sepharad) that historically had a strong Jewish presence and may still have some descendants of Conversos living there, though not as Jews.

These events are based on Jewish themes but are not themselves Jewish events. Cohen argues that they are invented festivals because they reinvent the Jewish past of the region through music, food, customs and sometimes prayers. But she stresses that these are a pastiche of recently learned customs rather than long-maintained traditions.

For example, Ribadavia's Festa da Istoria includes an original play about the Inquisition and a mock Sephardi wedding. Local merchants get into the spirit too.

Exploring the Pirkei Avot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at the many resources on the Internet for the Mishnah. This week, we concentrate on one of the Mishnah's most interesting and unique books, Pirkei Avot.

What makes this book so different (and popular on the Internet)? The Jewish Student Online Research Centre explains: [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Judaism/pirkei_avot.html] "Sixty-two of the 63 short books that make up the Mishnah are legal texts. The only tractate of the 63 that does not deal with laws is called Pirkei Avot (usually translated as Ethics of the Fathers). Pirkei Avot transmits the favorite moral advice and insights of the leading rabbinic scholars of different generations."

Because each line of Pirkei Avot can be understood and debated on so many levels, the Internet has become an obvious repository for its wisdom.

If you have Hebrew fonts installed you can read the entire book on line [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/mishna/abut.html]. However, the best Pirkei Avot site was created by the Orthodox Union [http://www.ncsy.org/torah/lual/]. All six chapters are printed in the original Hebrew along with an English translation and a lengthy commentary. You don't need Hebrew fonts, but you will need the free Adobe Acrobat Reader software [http://www.adobe.com/prodindex/acrobat/readstep.html] to read this material.

Other online translations and commentaries include Chabad-Lubavitch in Cyberspace [http://www.chabad.org/gopher/texts/ethics-s.exp/] and Thunder from Sinai: Essays on Pirkei Avot [http://jewishamerica.com/Thunder.htm]. Rabbi Shaya Karlinsky, dean of Darche Noam Institutions, teaches a course on Pirkei Avot based on the classic commentary of the Maharal from Prague. You can read the introduction to his course on line [http://www.csudh.edu/hum/religion/religion-mishnah.html]

The simplicity and the truth of Pirkei Avot touch people on a powerful, personal level. A member of Shaarei Shamayim, Madison, Wisconsin's Jewish Reconstructionist community sees "Pirkei Avot as a kind of ethical code for those who want not only to lead an ethical life for themselves, but also to guide others and to assist in the repair of the world (Tikkun Olam)" [http://www.rdcbraille.com/css-dc01.html].

Pirkei Avot may be thousands of years old, but its most famous phrase has become the foundation of one modern writer's thoughts on social responsibility. In The Three Questions: Prosperity and the Public Good, Bob Rae quotes Hillel's questions: "If I am not for myself, then who is for me? If I am only for myself, then what am I? If not now, when?" (Avot 1:14) [http://www.thestar.com/back_issues/ED19981107/opinion/981107INS03_IN-URQ7.html].

Ontario's former socialist premier surprised some readers when he answered the first question, saying: "Self-interest has a purpose and a place at the heart of civil society. Appeals to self-sacrifice, compassion and even generosity are rarely a successful substitute for appeals to self-interest."

My favorite Pirkei Avot site illustrates that the appeal for the book transcends all ages. Rochell Sobel and her Grade 4 class at the Charles E. Smith Jewish Day School in Montgomery County, Md., have created a beautiful little site [http://www.cesjds.org/saying/]. Each student has picked a favorite saying from Pirkei Avot, illustrated it and recorded themselves reciting the phrase in Hebrew.

Jewish silence a danger

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the next few weeks, the Torah portions include the revelation at Sinai and the Ten Commandments. God commands us to honor our parents in order to lengthen our days upon this earth.

The midrash tells the story of Elisha ben Abuya, later known as Aher (the Other). Elisha was a master in the academy, and his student was Rabbi Meir, a great rabbinic scholar. Elisha was also a heretic.

According to the midrash, Elisha had observed a son obeying his father while performing another commandment, one that appears in Deuteronomy. The father had asked the son to climb a tree and chase the mother bird away in order to take the eggs. The commandment to chase the mother bird away is also followed by the declaration of meriting long life. Only these two commandments are explicitly said to result in long life. In this one act of obeying his father and chasing the bird, the son should have been granted an extra-long life. Instead, the son was killed climbing down the tree. When Elisha saw the son die, his faith was broken. He renounced all his learning as false and became Aher, the avid heretic.

Interestingly, the Talmud recounts incidents of Rabbi Meir continuing to meet with Aher and continuing to study Torah with him. On one occasion it is the Sabbath, and Rabbi Meir is sitting with his students and studying Torah. He is told that Aher is in the marketplace. Rabbi Meir leaves his students and enters the marketplace in order to discuss Torah with Aher. After they have walked and debated Torah for some time, Aher tells Rabbi Meir to turn back, since they have approached the Sabbath barrier.

It is a beautiful moment of mutual respect. Rabbi Meir respects Aher's understanding of Torah, despite his personal struggles, and Aher respects Rabbi Meir's Judaic choices, despite their differences.

After both Aher and Rabbi Meir have died, the Talmud presents a midrash in which another rabbi meets Elijah the prophet. When he asks Elijah what God is doing, the prophet responds that God is reciting the teachings of all the rabbis, except those of Rabbi Meir. When asked why, Elijah responds that since Rabbi Meir continued to learn Torah from Aher, his name is being excluded. The rabbi argues the sense of this and ultimately wins the argument. The Talmud concludes: Hereafter God will begin to say, "My son Meir says."

Many Jews today point fingers at other Jewish beliefs and label them Aher – the other. Judgments are passed, and we refuse to teach and learn from each other to the point of refusing to enter each other's buildings. Rabbi Meir would not let go of Elisha ben Abuya, for he knew the debate must continue. Jewish history has shown us it is not the Jewish debate that is dangerous to us – it is Jewish silence.

A modern blood libel

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Tarnobrzeg, Poland, formerly known as Dzikow, cannot be accused of being a pretty town. With a population of 40,000, it is perched on the eastern bank of the Vistula, in a region known for the production of sulphur. One pictures a dreary, blighted place, surrounded by dark denuded hills.

In 1757, a 15-year-old Christian boy disappeared from Tarnobrzeg. Allegations quickly arose that the Jews had murdered the boy and used his blood in the baking of matzah.

As in scores of localities across Christian Europe since medieval times, the results of Tarnobrzeg's blood libel were tragically predictable. Upon the scantiest of circumstantial evidence, 12 Jewish men were arrested, tortured and burned at the stake. The other local Jews fled.

Like the Salem witch-hunts or the auto-da-fes of 15th-century Spain, Tarnobrzeg's 242-year-old blood libel has cast a stain upon the town's reputation that does not easily go away. It marks the town even today.

Michael Honey, a retired engineer who lives in London, England, has been waging a war against Tarnobrzeg since 1993, after reading a defamatory article about the blood libel trial in Zeszyty Historyczne, a local historical journal. Originally written in 1929, the reprinted article conveyed the impression that the Jews had actually committed the crime for which they had been judicially murdered.

The article neglected to mention that the alleged Christian murder victim was found living in a nearby town in 1774. Neither did the journal's editor, Tadeusz Zych, bother to explain that the Jews were innocent of the fabricated murder pinned on them.

Born in the former Czechoslovakia, Honey experienced Auschwitz as a child, and served as Mengele's messenger boy. Most of his family, including his Tarnobrzeg-born mother, were murdered.

After reading the Zeszyty Historyczne, Honey took a Zola-like stance, writing a firmly-worded letter to Zych and demanding a retraction. Zych, amidst a flurry of polite regrets, declined. Honey wrote the town's mayor, the Polish ambassador to Britain, and others. Five years later, a retraction is still not imminent.

"If a fellow writes an age-old lie as fact, he's actually like an eel, and you try to get hold of him and he slips through your fingers – he turns this way and that," Honey says. "But I've come to the point where I don't turn away any more. I don't think it's good policy any more for the Jews to turn a blind eye.

"For me, it's a result of being in the camps, of being a slave. There was a time when I had to obey my masters because I was a slave – literally. You know, a slave has got to say 'Yes, sir.' I'm not prepared to live like that any more."

Honey's unrelenting war on Tarnobrzeg has made some of his genealogical colleagues uneasy, partly because Zych has a proven sympathetic interest in local Jewish history and has helped Jewish genealogists trace their roots in the region.

Suzan Wynne, a Maryland-based specialist in Galician Jewish genealogy, admits she doesn't sanction Honey's confrontational approach. "I really believe that we need to work cooperatively with people, perhaps teach them by helping them get to know real Jews," she says. "Most of these people have never seen a Jew – their only contact with Jews has been in history books. So I feel we need to be ambassadors and diplomats, and represent ourselves as cooperative, interested human beings."

Gayle Schlissel Riley, a California genealogist, has a special interest in the Tarnobrzeg controversy, since her ancestor, Joske (Joseph) Shubnik, was among those burned alive. But apparently her attitude is to turn the other cheek. "Some genealogists have said they're willing to take this all the way to Elie Wiesel, even to the Pope," she observes, "but hate doesn't do anything but beget hate."

Contacted by letter, Zych admits he committed a "grave error" by presenting the libel as fact, but says he is caught in a delicate balance between philo-Semitic and anti-Semitic forces. Still, he indicates that Zeszyty Historyczne will revisit the subject sometime in the coming year.

Meanwhile, Michael Honey remains unswerving in his resolve to see that the historical record, in this one instance, is properly corrected.

Chanukah in Myanmar a unique experience

By RISA ROCHWERG and STEVEN RAICH

A package arrived for us in Bangkok at the general post office. The customs clearance documentation stated that the contents were candles. Curiously, we opened the package from home and found a menorah, a box of candles and chocolate Chanukah gelt. That was the beginning of a special feeling we had about our upcoming Chanukah.

Dec. 13 arrived, and we boarded a flight to Yangon, Myanmar (formerly Burma). We checked into our hotel and were disappointed to find that our room had no windows for us to display the first light of our menorah.

Guest Voices

During the day, we wandered the bustling streets of Yangon and investigated our surroundings. From the centre of the marketplace, a light blue building with a Magen David rose above the chaos.

We pushed our way through the crowds to the gates of the building, which had a sign reading Musmeah Yeshua Synagogue. A Burmese man dressed in a traditional longyi (sarong) approached us and asked if we would like to return later that evening for the celebration of Chanukah.

We arrived at the synagogue dressed in our backpacking attire, and met Moses Samuels, the trustee of the synagogue. Samuels singlehandedly maintains the synagogue, and keeps it open for tourists; he has done a remarkable job with the upkeep. He also tries to protect the Jewish cemetery from commercial development.

Moses talked to us about the history of the more than 100-year-old synagogue and showed us the beautiful Torah scrolls. At one time, Myanmar had a population of 3,000 Jews; today, 30 remain.

Samuels informed us that the Israeli Embassy was hosting a Chanukah celebration that evening and that we were more than welcome to attend. We made our way to the Traders Hotel, one of the newer and more prestigious hotels in Yangon. Hesitantly, we climbed the stairs and met two representatives of the Israeli Embassy who were greeting the guests.

Obviously out of place, we explained our situation and were kindly invited to stay for the festivities – 300 dignitaries, a handful of Israeli tourists and us. We passed through the metal detector and had our bags hand-inspected. We entered the large ballroom decorated with Israeli flags and a large menorah, and stood in the reception line to meet the Israeli ambassador. The room was filled with people from all over the world, each with a connection to the Jewish state.

The ambassador opened the function with an address about the State of Israel's 50th year and explained the Festival of Lights. Together with Myanmar's minister of foreign affairs, the ambassador lit the first Chanukah candle, and two girls sang Hanerot Hallalu. Potato "brownies" and jam donuts were served, and a promotional film on Israel was shown to this large audience in Yangon. This grand celebration for the first night of Chanukah certainly surpassed our plans for a low-key evening.

Until the seventh night of Chanukah, we lit our menorah on our own, often in the dark because of electricity shortages in Myanmar. On the seventh night of Chanukah, we arrived in Hsipaw, a small village in the Shan State.

Based on a recommendation, we tried to find a certain Mr. Book who would be able to direct us to a guesthouse. We arrived at Mr. Book's bookstore and found a golden menorah and Israeli flags. He invited us to his Chanukah celebrations that evening and gladly accepted our additional menorah.

Mr. Book, a Muslim, had crafted his menorah for his Israeli friends who visit, and had hosted celebrations each of the eight nights. So on the seventh night of Chanukah, we, Mr. Book and eight Israelis lit two menorahs, sang songs and ate the feast that Mr. Book and his family had prepared. When we left Hsipaw, we left our menorah in Mr. Book's hands for Chanukah 1999.

We had limited expectations for Chanukah in Myanmar, and yet we found some interesting festivities in a country where only 30 Jews reside. We realize that this was a unique experience, especially to find individuals like Moses Samuels and Mr. Book, who speak and act from the heart even though they live under an oppressive government regime. This Chanukah has lit a fire in us about humanity that will not die.

Judeo Latin Association planning Purim bash

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Organizers of an upcoming Purim party hope the festive event will raise the profile of the Judeo Latin Association of Canada (La Asociación Judeo Latina del Canada), a Toronto-based group for Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking Jews.

The party, to be held Feb. 28 at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill, will feature music, a costume contest and games.

The loosely structured organization – there are no formal memberships as yet – evolved from Spanish-language Torah classes led by Rabbi Abraham Bartfeld, a native of Mexico whose parents fled France in 1942 and initially spent two years in Cuba.

Rabbi Bartfeld, now 50, was rabbi at Baycrest Terrace's congregation in the late 1970s before returning to Mexico City to serve as Mexico's chief Ashkenazi rabbi for 18 years. He and his family moved back to Toronto two years ago.

"I was looking for a long time for an organization that would fulfil my need to learn Torah in my mother tongue," said Esperanza Evenstein, a 42-year-old Panamanian who has lived here for 16 years.

Evenstein, who attended Jewish day school as a child, initially came here for a visit, liked the country and decided to stay even before she met her husband, a native of Oshawa.

She began attending classes close to two years ago when they were offered at an Aish HaTorah location.

The classes, which run on two weeknights and are open to observant and non-observant alike, are now held in private homes. Rabbi Bartfeld teaches about Torah as well as Jewish philosophy, which is very difficult to grasp in a foreign language, noted Evenstein.

Rabbi Abraham Bartfeld

She enjoys the ambience in the Spanish-language classes. "English-speaking classes are normally more rigid, more serious. The culture we come from is less formal."

Aside from the classes, the association has begun to organize social and holiday programs.

"[Participants] tend to help each other," said Rabbi Bartfeld, referring in part to the business networking that takes place. At least one person found housing with help from the group.

"I think [the association] has a future. I see that people care," said the rabbi at his home, where he holds regular Shabbat services for about 25 people.

Participants in the association represent a variety of backgrounds, both Ashkenazi and Sephardi, with people from Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Mexico, Morocco and Peru.

There is even an anglophone Canadian. Melanie Craig, 26, a graduate of McGill University who has studied in Mexico and Colombia, enjoys the warm atmosphere of the group. "There's always some music, some good food and drinks. There's a lot of camaraderie."

For Craig, the classes are "the ultimate." It had never occurred to her she would be able to study Torah in Spanish, she said.

Although the focus of the classes is education, said the rabbi, "we always have a little bit of time to talk about news from back home."

For further information about the association or the Purim party, call Debbie at 905-889-0020 or Esperanza at 905-886-7935. Purim party tickets are also available at the Sephardic Kehila Centre.

Jewish deaf-blind man 'speaks out'

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The voice of Harold Smith, 79, a Jewish deaf and blind man, is like a call of the wild.

Smith tries so hard to answer questions in his own voice, although he knows it is impossible for the ordinary person to understand him. But he keeps trying, which is one reason he has survived.

Smith "reads" the questions on his fingers, tapped out in two-handed manual fashion by his young intervenor, Marta Irwin. After his initial attempt to answer with his own voice, requiring almost painful effort on his part, he replies to Marta in sign language.

The son of Samuel and Edith Smith, who ran a tailoring shop at Queen and Greenwood streets, he said he was "too poor" to attend any Hebrew school, but adheres to his Jewish faith by attending synagogue with an intervenor when he can. With the intervenor's help, he understands some of the synagogue service. Among the synagogues, he has attended are Beth Tikvah, Shaarei Shomayim and Beth Tzedec, the latter for a bar mitzvah and a wedding.

Despite his handicaps, Smith enjoys life, particularly when friends drop in for a surprise visit to his third-floor one-bedroom apartment in the Rotary Cheshire building where he is second in seniority among the 16 tenants to an active 88-year-old woman. He has lived here since the building opened in 1992.

He keeps busy doing macrame and reads Braille books and magazines from the CNIB, "although I'm a slow reader."

His skill at crafts paid off when he sold 17 baskets at the Bob Rumball Centre for the Deaf on Bayview Avenue, where he used to live.

Smith was born in the Kew Beach area of Toronto, where a number of Jews once lived, but six months later he developed convulsions and became deaf. He is the only deaf person in his family. A diabetic, he began losing his sight 20 years ago and is now blind.

At the age of seven, Smith was sent to the Clinton Street school for the deaf, and later to the school at Belleville. At 17, he began home school instruction with his late brother, William. Smith wanted to become a printer, but this was during the Depression, and there were no jobs. So he worked in his father's tailoring and dry cleaning shop for 33 years.

"I hated the work," he says candidly.

But he goes on to say how much fun he had at other times – on an apple-picking trip or attending the CNE, for example – and how he likes to have dinner out with friends, always with an intervenor, because he can't travel alone.

During this three-way conversation, Smith keeps trying to speak out, but his words are unintelligible. Yet he holds no grudge against those, like the CJN reporter, who do not know sign language. Instead, he urges everyone to do their best to communicate with deaf-blind people like himself.

Smith cooks his own meals in the apartment, being careful to follow food rules for diabetics, especially when it comes to desserts. "I am terribly scared of the complications of diabetes. Right now I am okay with pills instead of insulin."

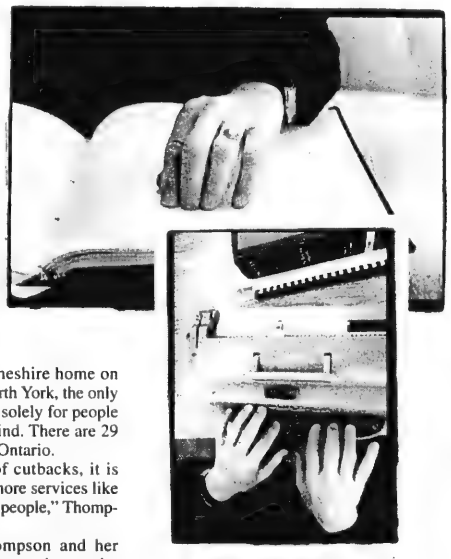
He had four sisters; two of them, Kay and Sylvia, are still alive and live in Toronto. He is a great-uncle to many nieces and nephews.

In his quest to have people better understand the plight of deaf-blind people, he has a strong ally in Joyce Thompson, director of his Rotary Cheshire home on Willowdale Avenue in North York, the only one in the world reserved solely for people who are both deaf and blind. There are 29 other Cheshire homes in Ontario.

"During these days of cutbacks, it is tough to get support for more services like intervenors for deaf-blind people," Thompson says.

At the moment, Thompson and her friends are concentrating on getting services expanded for such people, so that they can live independently, with access to information 24 hours a day.

Thompson says the official figure of 7,000 deaf-blind people in Canada does not include the many seniors who develop these handicaps later in life.



These photos by Natalie Schonfeld poignantly capture some of the moments of a day in the life of Harold Smith.

Help us move into our new home.

The new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders is going up.

It's going up at a tremendous pace.

The concrete shell of the building will be completed this winter. Anticipation is building. In those areas already poured, the walls of residents rooms are going up, the plumbing's going in and the wiring is being installed. Residents are looking forward to moving into a new facility that's much better equipped to meet the needs of seniors.

And, their anticipation will be rewarded. The rooms will be bigger, and all rooms will be private. Each room will have an entrance foyer and an ensuite washroom almost twice as large as in the current building.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

For more information on how you can be part of completing the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, call Shirley Worth in the Baycrest Centre Foundation at (416) 785-2500, Ext. 2013.

She'arim Hebrew Day School:

This is a place of miracles

By GITTIE BRUMER
Special to The CJN

Feature

I walk into the empty room, popping it in my mind's eye with the children who have sat at these desks, turned to me their bright, curious eyes, bent their heads to work with deep concentration. I see them frown in their struggles to master a new concept. I hear the sudden gasp and then the laughter when comprehension dawns. I watch them tumble all over themselves in their eagerness to learn. The room glows with their triumphs, and I think, this is a place of miracles.

I first started teaching at the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy, She'arim Hebrew Day School in September 1989. At the time, I was a fourth year student at the University of Toronto, trying to cope with the last few courses remaining in my double majors of mathematics and psychology. I had been working with learning disabled children on a part-time basis for three years, and had spent intensive hours under the guidance of Dori Levine, studying and applying the educational philosophy and methodology of Israeli psychologist Reuven Feuerstein.

Dori had worked with Feuerstein in Jerusalem, and her enthusiasm for his approach was obvious. His ideas attracted me immediately. Feuerstein presented a comprehensive, highly applicable model of cognitive processes, as well as a specific curriculum for developing thinking skills. Case histories described amazing success in his work with individuals with a wide range of disabilities, including learning disabilities, Down syndrome, brain damage and autism. Hope and optimism shone through all his writings, and drew me in.

My career plans at the time were vague and subject to change, as I considered one profession after another and then rejected each. Yet my work with Dori sparked my curiosity and appealed to my sense of deep commitment to Jewish education, and I began to wonder if there was a place for me in the field of Jewish special education.

My inquiries led me to the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy, She'arim Hebrew Day School, a school in Toronto for children with learning disabilities and attention deficit disorder. I walked in with a million questions. How could one expect these children to cope with a dual-language program, and the long hours of a Jewish day school? How did parents and children deal with the stigma of a specialized school? What techniques did teachers use to enable their students to progress? How did they enhance the self-esteem of these children, who carried the burden of unsuccessful experience in their previous schools? And was this something I could learn to do? Could I make a difference in some child's life?

I visited She'arim, and was fascinated. I watched the teachers with their classes, and experienced first hand the atmosphere of respect and encouragement. Here, every student is an individual, I thought, every child's strengths are recognized. I was impressed with the professional expertise of the school's staff, and more so with their dedication.

My excitement grew as I saw Feuerstein's theoretical concepts brought to life in the classrooms of She'arim, whose educational approach is based on Feuerstein's work.

Teachers discussed the process of learning with their students, as well as its product, and modified their own techniques to meet the needs of their students. Children talked about the strategies they used to solve problems of all sorts, in the classroom and outside of it, and slowly learned to change their thinking habits. I was enthralled, when Dori informed me of her new role as principal of She'arim and offered me a teaching position at the school. I gathered up my courage, took a deep breath and accepted.

I blink my eyes, and almost 10 years have passed. Suddenly, I am an experienced educator, with degrees and certificates in both Jewish education and special education, and I find myself training others in the techniques I know.

The students I taught in my first year at She'arim are adults now, embarking on their own careers, getting married, moving on. They come to visit occasionally, seeking guidance or sharing their success. Many still think of She'arim as a second home.

The school itself has grown, too, with nine classes now, and a population of almost 70 students from grade 1 to grade 8. The building is bursting at the seams.

The school still offers a full academic program in secular and Judaic studies, as well as cognitive skills training using Feuerstein's instrumental enrichment. The child study team still includes a consulting psychologist and part-time art therapist. A variety of new programs have also been added over the years. A psychologist is on staff to work with children and families, and a remediation/enrichment specialist works with students on specific content areas. A unique integrated arts program brings the curriculum to life using art media within the classroom. Physical education, music and computer programs allow the children to develop a broad range of abilities.

Teachers, all trained in Feuerstein's approach, continue to direct their efforts and expertise towards meeting the academic, social, organizational, behavioral and cognitive objectives of their students. The school's current principal, Kathy Manoim, guides the school along with quiet competence, and an atmosphere of sensitivity and diligence pervades its classrooms. She'arim has earned a place in the forefront of the educational world.

I look back at my own years of experience, working with my students every day. Time has made me more realistic. I have learned that not every child with learning disabilities and/or attention deficit disorder can benefit from the She'arim's program. I also know that with limited resources, the school cannot meet the need that exists for precisely the program it offers. But I am still amazed by the dedication and commitment I see in everyone connected with She'arim: the teachers, the board and the administration. I am still impressed with the success of our students. And I am still entranced by the children.

She'arim was founded in 1980 by Rabbi Yitzchak Witty, Rabbi Joseph Kelman and the late Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg. I am amazed that so much has been accomplished in only 18 years, and grateful to be a part of it. My students continue to enchant me, and I have learned that no one can predict their future achievements. Their energy and enthusiasm, their determination to succeed, are inspiring. I watch their progress with awe and humility. We set goals together and plan each step carefully – and still, I am surprised by my students' creativity and perseverance. I observe with ceaseless wonder as they overcome obstacles and face challenges with more bravery than I possess. I have learned a great deal from you, my students.

The classroom is empty. Yet when I look around, I can see my students gazing back at me, with their mischievous smiles and bewitching eyes. Their futures look so hopeful from where I sit. This is a place of miracles.

Disagreement 'sours' Auschwitz visit: CJC

Jewish community or with Congress.

"We have a problem with the PMO [for their] lack of sensitivity, understanding and total disregard for the feelings of our community," Gettlich said.

In news reports from Poland, Chrétien said that "the Polish Canadian Congress was invited and the Ukrainian Canadian Congress was invited and the Jewish National Congress [CJC] was invited. They were all invited."

"It was felt that it was appropriate to have Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith with the prime minister on this visit," said Sophie Galarneau, a spokesperson for the PMO. "By his visit to the camp, the prime minister would be paying homage to all the victims of the Holocaust on behalf of all Canadians."

Conrad said the Polish Congress had been led to believe they were being invited to participate only in the trade portion of the mission. The CPC learned about the visit to Auschwitz through media reports, and immediately contacted the PMO's office to request "a similar invitation be extended to three representatives of our community and organization. They were turned down by Paul Sparks, director of operation for the Team Canada trip," Conrad said.

The Polish community feels "excluded" and "snubbed," Gettlich said.

"We wanted to be part of the pilgrimage to Auschwitz in view of the fact we have people here" who survived the Nazi camp, Conrad added.

In a letter to Conrad following his return from Poland, Ronen expressed his "disappointment and profound disagreement with you on the claim for parity in connection with the prime minister's pilgrimage to Auschwitz. At Auschwitz-Birkenau, 1.5 million human beings – more than 1.3 million of them Jews – were murdered.

"The Holocaust is the monumental tragedy of the Jewish people and no other. And Auschwitz is symbolic of the Holocaust. It was therefore entirely appropriate that an official Jewish delegation accompany Chrétien to Auschwitz in what, first and foremost, was a desire to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust and to honor Holocaust survivors.

"This does not mean that other victims of the Nazis, including Poles, are unrecognized," Ronen wrote.

Ronen said he believes the visit to Auschwitz "sensitized the prime minister to the concerns of the Jewish community in a way that was done honorably and solemnly ... Ultimately this will help underscore in the prime minister's mind the need for a free-standing Holocaust museum in Ottawa."

The visit to Auschwitz was emotional for all participants, particularly his father. A wave of emotion swept his father as soon as the group entered the camp through the gate marked with the phrase "Arbeit Macht Frei" (work sets you free). His father recited the Shema Yisrael prayer as they entered the camp, in honor of the Jews who did the same on their way to their deaths, Ronen said.

The visitors were particularly moved by the rooms piled high with human hair and with children's shoes. "How can you not be overwhelmed by that?" Ronen asked.

During their visit, the group stopped at the wall where thousands of political prisoners were shot. The guide made it clear that many Poles were among those killed, and the prime minister laid a wreath in their memory, Ronen said.

Three MPs of Polish heritage – Stan Keyes, Carolyn Parrish and Stan Dromisky – participated in the visit and Ronen said others who had travelled to Poland on the trade mission also took the opportunity to visit the camp.

One controversial area of Auschwitz was not on the prime minister's tour – a field of 239 crosses placed on land adjacent to the back entrance of the main camp. The crosses are on property owned by Carmelite Sisters and subleased to "a self-proclaimed defender of the 'cross' and the Carmelite Sisters, who with the help of skinheads and ultra-orthodox Christians erected hundreds of crosses of varying sizes," according to Auschwitz survivor Nate Leipciger.

Leipciger, national chair of Congress' Holocaust remembrance committee, said the Polish government is in the process of expropriating the land while also moving to pass legislation to take jurisdiction over former Nazi concentration camps out of local and regional control. The Polish government proposes to establish a National Council to preserve the grounds of camps including Auschwitz, Majdanek, Stuthoff, Gross Rosen, Treblinka, Chelmno, Belzec and Sobibor, he said.

Leipciger, who is the only Canadian representative on the International Council to the State Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau, said the group has been told by Polish Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek that the government plans to remove all the crosses except the "Papal Cross" that commemorates the Pope's first visit to the camp.

Leipciger said the Roman Catholic Church in Poland has "come out against" the proliferation of crosses on the leased premises, believing they "desecrate the cross by using a religious symbol to provoke confrontation."

Conrad and Gettlich said the CPC had never taken a position on the issue, but it is a matter that may be raised at the organization's next meeting. Gettlich said she believed the crosses "might be provocative to the Jewish survivors" of Auschwitz. She and Conrad said they supported the church's position on the crosses.

The placement of crosses at Auschwitz has been a long-simmering issue. In a document published about one year ago, Congress argued that the "Christianization" of Auschwitz "can only be ameliorated by the Catholic Church of Poland; absence of appropriate action by the Church will, justifiably, be viewed by Jews as a manifestation of age-old Christian imperialism."

The document, prepared with the input of Rabbi Dow Marmur, Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Leipciger, suggests religious symbols are inappropriate at Auschwitz and can "present problems to the Jews."

"The most religious expression is self-restraint; anything else often suggest the opposite to what it purports to be," the document states.

"A permanent, exceptionally large cross located in a prominent location to be visible from a large part of camp area... will invariably be seen as a specific statement calculated and intended to provoke others and not as a true expression of faith. Therefore, it would be wiser not to rely on religious symbols to express a group's adherence to a specific religious group," the Congress document states.

Ontario government helps boost Hebrew U Friends' scholarships

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (CFHU) is tripling its scholarship money in Ontario, thanks in large part to a provincial government dollar-matching program.

Under the Ontario Student Opportunity Trust Fund program, the Ontario government contributes a dollar for every dollar contributed privately to scholarship endowments at Ontario universities. The recipients must be Ontario residents registered at an Ontario university.

The program was designed to encourage the private sector to support scholarship endowments, said Mark Gryfe, executive vice-president of CFHU.

Scholarship endowment donors – in this case, CFHU – had until March 1997 to pledge. They must fulfil their commitments by the end of this March.

Because yearly costs for overseas students at the Hebrew University run $18,000 to $20,000 (for tuition, transportation, room and board), the new scholarships will open the door to people who would not otherwise apply, said Gryfe.

'Will help to open doors for students'

With almost $3 million raised and another two months to go, the program has the potential to generate $700,000 of annual scholarship funds, in addition to scholarships currently offered.

CFHU has pledged $2 million each at York University and the University of Toronto, and $2 million to be divided among six other universities: the University of Western Ontario, the University of Guelph, the University of Ottawa, the University of Waterloo, Queen's University and McMaster University.

York and U of T, like the Ontario government, are also matching the CFHU funds. For the scholarships at the other universities, an anonymous donor recently came forward to match funds as well.

Most of the money will be used to send undergraduate students to the Rothberg International School at the 73-year-old Jerusalem campus, where students can choose from a variety of courses including sciences, business, humanities and religious studies. Students can study in English, and credits are applicable to their Canadian degree, Gryfe noted. Graduate students are also eligible for the funds.

The scholarship program should be in full swing for the 2000-2001 academic year, once the money has begun to earn interest.

"This is really an altruistic program," said Gryfe, pointing out that the scholarship money will reside at the individual Ontario universities. "Most organizations raise money that stays in their organizations. There's nothing in it for the Hebrew University, except [CFHU's] ability to send more people... It's an opportunity we're trying to maximize so that there are scholarship funds in place forever."

Gryfe believes the program will have a considerable impact on the Jewish community here. "There's nothing better in terms of an Israel experience than a year in Israel. In most cases, [returning] students give back to their community."

גידי קורן וחברים

"למדתי שאפשר לחיות ולהסתדר
גם בלוע של אריה, אם אין מקום אחר".

שיהיה טוב, ורק בריאות.

תוחלת החיים - לרוץ:

"שייקספיר מאוהב":

"Happiness":

Jewish characters in film becoming more mainstream

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For many years, despite the significant role Jews played in creating and running Hollywood, except for a few propaganda films made during World War II and two or three films about anti-Semitism after the war, it was unusual to see a distinctively Jewish character appear in a mainstream American film.

This situation has reversed itself recently. Most of the original Jewish shakers and movers in Hollywood have disappeared, and it might be that the Jews who make films today feel more comfortable with their Jewishness.

Today Jewish characters appear in all sorts of films, sometimes for no particular purpose at all. Other times the characters' Jewishness is an integral part of the storyline.

This month, several of these "Jewish" films have been released on video.

The best of these is Mendel, a Norwegian film that premiered in Toronto last May at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Mendel tells about a Jewish refugee family making a new home in Norway after World War II. The story is told through the eyes of the family's younger son, Mendel.

In some ways this film reminds us of the pressures faced by many Jewish refugees in adapting to a new land under trying conditions. In this case, the Norwegian hosts are innocently insensitive to the needs and desires of the newcomers, pushing their Protestant beliefs in the faces of the Jewish immigrants.

Mendel is an excellent coming of age drama that explores some of the problems of growing up as a stranger in a strange land, and although it is a serious film, it has many light moments.

If you have a problem finding this video in the store, you may call CHV Communications directly at 416-633-9079 to order a copy or to obtain further information.

Also recently released was Pi, a surreal black and white film about Max, a young Jewish mathematics and computer genius. Max's life revolves around his apartment and the super computer he has built in an attempt to find the pattern beneath all the numbers spewed out by the stock market. He wants to find some kind of order in an apparently unordered world.

Max's reputation precedes him, and he is approached by a large Wall Street firm that wants to recruit him. At the same time, a chassidic group tries to entice him to work for them to delve into the mysteries of the Kabbalah. In fact, Max is probably not suited for any job, as he has a problem living in the real world.

The Slums of Beverly Hills is a little more mainstream. It is another coming of age story, but this time about a Jewish girl who must deal with a dysfunctional family. Her father, played by Alan Arkin, tries to keep the family together although his wife has left. He keeps moving the family from one run-down apartment to another because he cannot earn enough to pay the rent. But he also insists that the family live in Beverly Hills so that his kids can take advantage of that town's excellent public school system.

Just-A-Second Puts Need First!

While fashion fads come and go, helping those in need is always in style at The Just-A-Second Shop. Simply ask the shoppers who visit the store more than 17,000 times each year.

The store, operated by Jewish Family and Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, supplies gently used clothing, houseware items and children's toys free of charge or at drastically reduced prices to the needy. Although a large proportion of the shop's clientele are community members receiving financial assistance or newly-arrived immigrants referred through Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, store manager Klara Ifrah says more of the city's working poor are becoming regular customers.

"Nobody comes to our store by choice," explains Ifrah, herself an immigrant who once relied on community services. "They come because they can't afford to go anywhere else, but they still want and deserve to wear decent clothes."

"I feel privileged to have the opportunity to get what I need for my daughter and myself at no cost," says 27 year old Maya Brewer (not her real name). Brewer struggles to make ends meet every month and admits "it's comforting to know someone is looking out for me."

But while treating clients with dignity is second nature to the volunteers and staff at Just-A-Second, maintaining an adequate selection of high quality inventory doesn't come as easily. A 25% drop in donations over last year, a growing trend towards selling on consignment and a steady proliferation of clothing drop-off boxes, with one situated directly across the street from the store, provide tough competition. Ifrah reports a shortage of everything from women's wear and bed sheets to pots and pans and other household appliances.

Yet Just-A-Second does possess a competitive edge. Unlike other charitable organizations, many which sell clothing for cash to third parties, Just-A-Second makes sure that most of the donations received are distributed to the local needy.

"Not everyone can make that claim," says Florence Weinberger, Communications Manager at JF&CS, who is proud of the shop's record of serving more than 40,000 people since opening in 1982. Profits made after covering operating expenses are used to send children served by JF&CS - many coping with abuse, poverty and other difficulties - to summer camp. The shop has also become a hub of community services, drawing hundreds of volunteers from agencies such as the United Way, schools, and private businesses.

"This is a real community establishment," notes Barbara Barak, Coordinator of JF&CS Volunteer Services. "In fact many of our clients have shown their gratitude and appreciation by coming back to work in the store as volunteers."

Donations in good condition, which are always welcome, can be brought to 4117 Bathurst Street, Monday - Thursday 11:00 am - 6:00 pm and Sunday 11:00 am - 3:00 pm. For more information, call (416) 633-9898.

(l-r) Irina Sotenskaia, Klara Ifrah, Sima Kustikov and Rebecca Hirsh believe in making their customers feel comfortable at The Just-A-Second Shop.

UJA Federation Rescues Vital JF&CS Programs

Jewish Family and Child Service will not be forced to reduce essential services thanks to an emergency funding package recently approved by UJA Federation's Board of Directors.

A specially appointed UJA Federation task force responded to an urgent request from JF&CS for help late last year by recommending $425,000 in new money to the UJA Federation Board. The relief came just as the agency was scrambling to replace revenues lost as a result of severe government cutbacks to several funding programs.

Some of the critical programs that faced elimination included counseling for people on financial assistance, and for women and children who are victims of abuse. The agency's highly successful Child Witnessing Violence Project, founded four years ago with a private grant, and geared to children from homes where domestic violence occurs, was one of the programs social workers feared would disappear as a result of the cash crunch.

"These programs are vital to helping children and their families cope with this traumatic experience," says Program Coordinator Susan Brotman. "As it is, there are kids we aren't able to reach."

"UJA Federation helped us avert a major crisis," explains JF&CS Executive Director Gordon Wolfe, who brought the case for additional funding to UJA Federation last fall. "We were facing very serious waiting lists which would have meant people who need help the most weren't going to receive it."

Each year JF&CS provides more than 1,500 individuals with counseling, financial assistance and rehabilitation services.

The recent injection of funds will also benefit Chaplaincy Service visits to hundreds of Jews in nursing homes, hospitals, jails and other institutions; camp subsidies for disadvantaged children; and, social worker support for day school students having trouble with their studies.

Along with the financial help came a commitment from UJA Federation to work closely with JF&CS to develop long-term fundraising strategies. "The vital importance of JF&CS to our community's well-being necessitates a strong relationship," notes UJA Federation President Joseph Steiner.

"Working together to help the most vulnerable among us is the strongest expression of what our community is all about," adds JF&CS President Richard Cumming.

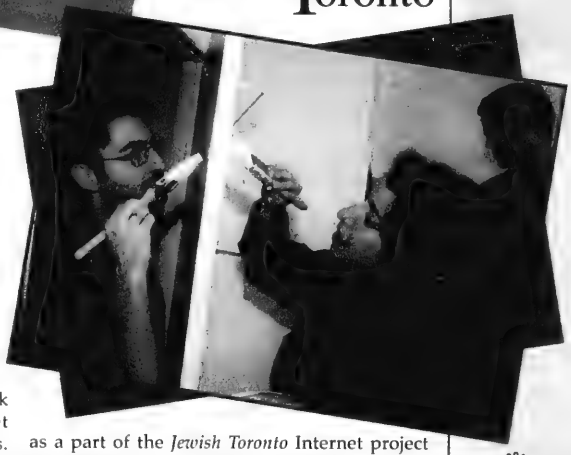
Hands On Toronto

Hats Off To... Hands On Toronto

"We always have new people searching for a way to make a difference."



Anyone who says young adults lack commitment to a cause hasn't met Hands On Toronto (HOT) volunteers. They're a group of young Jewish professionals who've been known to spend their Sundays cheering up seniors at nursing homes and painting run down apartments for single mothers and their children.

Since 1997, HOT, one of UJA Federation's Young Leadership Programs, has become an appealing alternative to more traditional types of communal involvement. It's a "tell-us-what-you-need-and-we'll-get-down-to-business" type of philanthropy that offers busy, charity-minded 30-something individuals a chance to do some good and connect with their Jewish roots.

"UJA Federation realized there was a growing desire among young Jewish adults, in their 20s and 30s, to take a proactive, hands on approach to community work," explains Lori Winch, who co-chairs the hugely popular HOT program with Cory Gurevitz. "Most of our volunteers are professionals determined to make every minute count when it comes to charity."

Working closely with UJA Federation and several beneficiary agencies, HOT volunteers meet regularly to identify needs within the community and plan activities and events that either enhance or supplement existing initiatives.

Last year, HOT volunteers, some of whom have also graduated from UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program, participated in 14 different projects with seniors, poor and abused children, hospital patients and community members seeking employment or help with starting a new business. Volunteers also helped to set up a web site for Jewish adults as a part of the Jewish Toronto Internet project and decorated a sukkah outside Mount Sinai Hospital.

Three new additions to the 1999 HOT mitzvah menu include projects with the BJC's Children's Discovery Museum, Kehilla non-profit residential buildings and the downtown Jewish community.

"A lot of people my age are looking for something deeper and more meaningful to get involved with," explains 28-year-old Gurevitz. "We've grown from a dozen volunteers to close to 100, mostly through word of mouth", he adds.

"I feel like I'm contributing something important," says Elyza Litwin, who oversees HOT's activities with the JF&CS Big Brothers and Big Sisters program. Litwin, who became involved with UJA Federation through its Young Professionals Network, says she's not surprised at the amount of interest in HOT. "We always have new people searching for a way to make a difference."

You can meet HOT members at the Mitzvah 2000 volunteer recognition evening, February 7, 7:00 pm, 4600 Bathurst St. If you and some friends or colleagues have a HOT. project idea, call Elana Carr at (416) 631-5736.

Study Defines Downtown Jews

Downtown Jewish Day School students (l-r) Tal Schwartz, Madeleine Golubev, Danielle Ilyaev, Max Lazar-Kurz, Mia Faircloth, Rachel Woroner, Nataly Ilyaev.

There are as many Jews living in downtown Toronto today as there are living in the entire city of Winnipeg, according to a UJA Federation population study. The report is the first comprehensive collection of demographic and statistical information about Jews living in the city centre.

"It's an extremely valuable resource," says Karen Chisvin, Chair of the 22 member Downtown Jewish Community Council, which is using the study to identify the needs of the close to 16,500 Jews now residing south of St. Clair.

Jay Brodbar, UJA Federation's Director of Research, says "there's no doubt the downtown Jewish population, which comprises 10% of the larger Jewish community, differs significantly from those further north."

For instance, Jews living in the downtown core are five times more likely to consider themselves ethnically rather than religiously Jewish. In addition, nearly half of the Jewish residents in some key downtown districts identified in the study are single.

"This tells us a great deal about the services and programs we should be delivering," says Joan Shoenfeld, principal of the Downtown Community Day School, which opened last September. The school, which expects to more than double enrollment for next year, is just one of dozens of grassroots services responding to a growing trend toward communal identification among downtown Jews.

"Jews, hidden in small pockets like Riverdale and the Danforth, are discovering each other and developing means of connecting," explains Chisvin. In recent years, membership has risen at many Jewish organizations such as the Danforth Jewish Circle, various synagogues and education facilities.

The Bloor Jewish Community Centre, which houses many of the Community Council's programs, synagogue services, as well as the new day school, boasts 3,000 members. Working together with community leaders and UJA Federation, the Bloor JCC, which serves 10,000 Jews and non-Jews annually, is planning to expand and renovate to accommodate its growth.

"The Bloor Jewish Community Centre remains the pre-eminent Jewish presence in the area and is vital to the future of the downtown Jewish community," notes David Green, Chair of the Bloor JCC's fundraising drive.

The Bloor JCC is at the centre of a long range plan, led by UJA Federation, to build a downtown Jewish community campus in conjunction with similar campaigns at the Bathurst Jewish Centre and York Region.

Abbie Solish is bursting with Jewish pride and loves to tell everyone why. In fact, the 17-year-old CHAT student hasn't missed an opportunity to do so since she returned from the UJA Federation funded March of the Living mission to Poland and Israel last spring.

"It was one of the most meaningful experiences I've ever had," says Solish, who has spoken about her visits to concentration camp sites and the 3 kilometre march from Auschwitz to Birkenau, to hundreds of students, friends, family members and even her own summer camp. "I feel strongly about sharing what I learned with as many people as possible."

But her participation in the March, along with 400 other Canadian teenagers, wasn't just a lesson in Jewish history. It was about her family.

"I used to ask my grandmother about the numbers faintly tattooed on her arm," explains Solish. "But I never received many answers."

In preparation for her journey, Solish decided to learn all she could about her maternal grandparents' experiences during the Holocaust, including the names of the towns where they lived and the camps where they were held. She also spoke at length with her parents and watched hours of videotape her mother had recorded.

"I wanted to know what they went through," insists Solish, who, as a tribute to her grandfather, read a speech she wrote about him at the camp where he died. "I'm not much of a public speaker," she admits, "but somehow I felt strong enough to do it that day."

Almost a year later, Solish, who often finds herself leafing through her journal pages and photographs, says her mission memories remain strong. "The trip gave me the opportunity to put all the bits and pieces together and to finally understand what my grandparents went through. It gave me some closure, a perspective on life, and more reasons to be proud of my Jewish heritage."

Abbie Solish lights a Yortzeit candle in memory of her grandparents below a monument at the Plaszow labour camp site near the city of Cracow in Poland.

Jewish Day School Enrollment Rising

"the dividends accrued as a result of the day school system, far outweigh the sacrifices"

Parents are still strongly committed to sending their kids to Jewish day schools despite higher costs and no government subsidies.

A recent population survey conducted by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education reports a 10% increase in day school enrollment over the past five years. The largest gain recorded during this time period occurred in Jewish high schools.

Approximately 11,000 students attend Toronto area Jewish day schools which charge fees from $7,000 - $11,000 a year. "In spite of financial sacrifices, the dividends accrued as a result of the day school system, far outweigh the sacrifices," adds Steven Teplitsky, father of four day school students.

"The increased trend towards day school education, in spite of the high expense, shows that more Jewish families recognize that the best formal education their children can receive to ensure their Jewish commitment, is day school education," says UJA Federation Vice Chair for Jewish Education, Shirley Worth.

"I am planning to send my daughter to day-school next year because I feel it's the best way for her to learn and reinforce the Jewish values we instill in her at home," adds Leslie Lerer.

Attendance at Jewish supplementary schools (after-school or weekend programs), has been steady with a slight increase of 5% over five years. Over 6,000 Jewish children receive supplementary school education.

"Significant numbers of Jewish families do not send their children to day schools, either because of the cost, or for a variety of other reasons. Many parents prefer the supplementary school option because the schools are relatively small and decentralized, reflecting the rich diversity of the community. With a synagogue or community organization affiliation, students have a direct connection to their community," adds supplementary school principal, Joan Schoenfeld.

Religious bill passes, UJA Federation reacts

Last week, the Knesset approved, by one vote, legislation to bypass a court ruling compelling religious councils to include Conservative and Reform representatives. This week, UJA Federation registered its concern.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto deeply regrets the Knesset's passage of new legislation regarding religious councils.

By requiring religious council members to, in effect, pledge their allegiance to the decisions of the Chief Rabbinate, the legislation will, unfortunately, deepen divisions between Israel and the Diaspora and harm worldwide Jewish unity.

...the Knesset measure... can only fuel passions...

The Knesset measure, adopted during the emotionally charged atmosphere of an election campaign, can only fuel passions, rather than contribute to rational and reasonable debate on such an urgent Jewish issue.

UJA Federation, representing a community consistently recognized for its solidarity with Israel, hopes that the next Knesset will reconsider this legislation and discuss alternatives, with a view to meeting the needs of Jews from all streams of Judaism.

Distance, illness fails to separate friends

By MAXINE FISCHBEIN
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — To Avital (Tali) Twersky, a 10-year-old far away in Bensalem, Penn., Calgary's Reena Saks is a friend indeed.

Tali was diagnosed with ocular melanoma in March 1997 – just three months before her best friend Reena, daughter of Rabbi Moshe and Meira Saks, moved to Calgary. But the young cancer patient's spirits were buoyed when her beloved Reena went back for a visit at the end of December under the auspices of the Fulfill a Wish Foundation.

On Dec. 15, Reena's mother, Meira Saks, got some bad news from Tali's mother, Arlette Twersky: Tali, who had already lost an eye to this rare form of cancer and had been told in May that it had metastasized to her liver and likely to her pancreas, had had a seizure. They feared that the disease had spread to her brain – a fear that later turned out to be unfounded.

Arlette Twersky had but one request, recalls Meira Saks. "Please send Reena. She is the best medicine Tali could have."

'She is the best medicine Tali could have'

Only one month before, Reena had been back in Pennsylvania for a family simchah, but only had a day and a half with her friend, because the Twerskys were in Nashville, Tenn., for most of the time. There, Tali underwent a treatment during which doctors removed and filtered her blood.

Unfortunately, the treatment did not achieve the desired results.

The two mothers – themselves close friends since the births of their daughters – had talked about another visit, and Twersky had made contact with airline representatives recommended to her by Chai Lifeline – an organization headquartered in New York that provides support to families with children who have cancer. Chai Lifeline has helped other Jewish families in Western Canada.

When Meira Saks called Chai Lifeline to secure an airline ticket for Reena in the midst of heavy holiday traffic, the organization raised the possibility of funding Reena's trip through the Fulfill a Wish Foundation – a Florida-based, non-profit organization that tries to make special dreams come true for children with life-threatening conditions. In the end, the Fulfill a Wish Foundation did help Reena Saks make Tali's wish come true.

Off Reena went, from Dec. 20 to 31, travelling on her own as an unaccompanied minor. Her one complaint about the journey: airline personnel who kept asking her, over and over again, "Are you okay?"

She was. And so, it seemed to her, was Tali. When Reena was ushered into her bedroom at 2 a.m., Arlette Twersky needed only to say, "Look who's here," says Reena, and her tired but excited friend fell into her arms for "a five minute hug."

During their time together, the girls went horseback riding – both share a special fondness for horses – as well as sledding and roller-skating. They made up a special handshake which includes a hug as well as a number of gesticulations far too confusing for the average adult. They took in a movie, and ate at a place called Fresh Fields, an organic market. Tali eats only organic food as part of a holistic approach to keeping her body strong so that it will respond to treatment. Her father, Mel Twersky, himself a physician, now shares that diet with his daughter.

Reena Saks and Tali Twersky

Reena also made some other rounds with her sidekick. They visited Tali's doctor, Dr. Kauffman, and Reena laughs about Tali greeting the physician with "Hi, Dr. (she coughed) man!"

Reena also joined the Twerskys when they went to see a very Orthodox, kabbalistic rabbi in New York.

"We had to wear long skirts and cover our necks," recalls Reena, who says the rabbi had letters from others who were cured of diseases after he gave them a special brachah.

The rabbi, adds Meira Saks, reviewed Mel and Arlette Twersky's ketubah (Jewish wedding contract) and discovered a spelling error. He then issued a new document and married the Twerskys once more. But the primary purpose of the visit was to provide Tali – a deeply spiritual child – with a blessing that would bring her yet more courage and strength to fight her cancer.

Reena says Tali seems pretty strong indeed. On Shabbat she loves to go to shul with her father – a walk of about a mile and a half, during which Tali "runs circles around everyone else," according to Reena. On one Shabbat, Tali made it to synagogue and back twice when Reena was too exhausted from her trip to go at all.

"She davens a lot," says Reena of the friend who has remained spiritual throughout her ordeal.

Reena herself has played a tremendous role in keeping Tali's spirits up, says Meira Saks, who received phone calls from both Tali's mother and grandmother following Reena's return to Calgary.

"Thank you, thank you," they said. "It meant so much to Tali and so much to us that you were willing to send her."

Bikur cholim (visiting the sick) is a mitzvah, says Meira Saks, and more than that, it is an important tool in the healing process. "It is not only necessary to look after the needs of the body, but also the needs of the soul. Building Tali's spirit up is part of her healing. For Reena to go on this journey was a way of helping Tali to heal."

While this would seem a lot for a 10-year-old to ask of herself, Reena Saks is no stranger to adversity. When she was only 3½ years old, on Sept. 19, 1992, her younger sister, Leah Miriam, was born with a terminal illness. For 5½ months, Reena took the greatest of pleasure in holding her sister's hand and loving her, yet knowing that she was going to lose her. Leah was born with Holoprosen-cephaly, a condition caused by a chromosomal anomaly. Just after this diagnosis, the Saks family also lost Reena's maternal grandfather. Then, on Feb. 25, 1993, they lost Leah to what Meira Saks calls "a medical situation with no answers but a definite and clear end."

During that tragic period, says Meira, and as young as the children were, "Tali saw Reena through."

Right now, says Meira, Tali's prognosis is a very guarded one.

"There is no current, documented, effective treatment that would put this in complete remission. Standard therapies do not cure this type of cancer, and they have nothing to go on that has yet been proven effective now that the disease has metastasized. They have great hopes that thalidomide treatments will prevent the tumors from spreading until an effective treatment is found."

While thalidomide – only recently approved in the United States – cannot cure the disease, it can arrest its spread by cutting off the blood supply to the tumors.

"The family's been told that, should the cancer metastasize further, it could threaten Tali's life," says Meira, "but it is also possible that the thalidomide, while not a cure, could freeze the disease, enabling her to take advantage of new therapies down the line as they become available."

In the meantime, Reena Saks' spirits are up following a wonderful visit with her friend. "She's doing really, really, really, really well," says Reena. "Every day she has more willpower."

Reena holds two beaded guardian angels sent to her mother by an e-mail friend, one for Tali and one for Reena, two friends who do not know what the future holds, but are certainly counting on sharing it.

In the meantime, despite illness and geographic distance, they hold each other close.

Friends indeed.

School qualifies for funds

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – For the first time since the creation of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (BJE) in the early 1980s, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) has approved in principle, funding for a Jewish school program which is independent of the BJE.

The recipient is the religious school run by Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's only Reform congregation.

This year 73 students, attending pre-school to post-bar/bat mitzvah programs, are enrolled in the school. Temple Shalom president Joann Greisman reports that student enrolment has ranged between 70 and 80 students over the past few years.

"We felt that Temple Shalom's school was providing a need that was not being serviced by the BJE or other Jewish education programs," says WJCC president Larry Hurtig.

"We felt that the school deserved to be part of our funding process."

The next step is for Temple Shalom to meet with the WJCC's budget and allocations committee to apply for specific funding.

"We are very pleased with the WJCC's decision," Greisman says. "We think that our school is making a contribution to the Jewish community at large. This doesn't mean that we are going to receive any funding though.

That is up to the budget and allocations committee."

Peace positions said close

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — In terms of their position on the peace process, the difference between the major parties in Israel is not very great, says the coordinator of special academic programs at Tel Aviv University.

Although the political situation is prone to fragmentation, said David Altshuller, there is not much difference of opinion on major issues, such as Jerusalem.

He spoke recently at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, as part of his Canadian lecture tour.

A Kingston native, Altshuller moved to Israel five years ago and is completing graduate studies at Tel Aviv University, where he also lectures in the Overseas Program of the Lowi School on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Altshuller also spoke of his meetings with Palestinians, and said that a lot of progress has been made in the past few years.

JIAS plans mentoring conference for immigrants

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Michael Briks, national executive director of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society (JIAS), could not be more enthusiastic about his latest project.

He is in the process of planning a conference, to be held in Winnipeg in May, that will bring together former and recent immigrants to Canada.

The conference, Friend Helping Friend, Helping Friend, will be an opportunity for former immigrants to share their know-how with recently arrived Jewish immigrants and refugees, who in turn will one day be able to mentor others.

"This is a dream come true," said Briks. "Immigrants doing for immigrants, who will do for other immigrants."

Briks said that participants will pay nothing to attend the conference. "The funding is being sourced entirely outside the Jewish community."

Jewish immigrants who have become highly successful since their arrival in Canada, will be invited to serve as mentors, facilitators, teachers, and potential employers for a select group of promising new Canadians. Facilitators need not have been JIAS clients in the past, but they must have an immigrant story.

"We are looking for high-profile people who have succeeded and have demonstrated excellence in their field, whether it be in the arts, professions or as entrepreneurs," Briks said.

The second group of conference participants, recent immigrants who landed in the country within the past two years, will be those identified by their communities as having demonstrated leadership promise and a commitment to becoming integral and contributing members of the Jewish community.

As a result of this conference, JIAS hopes to create a National Jewish Immigrant Employment Network.

"Our ultimate goal is to enable newcomers to give back to the communities that have so graciously received and assisted them," Briks said.

The Winnipeg conference is the latest in a long list of projects developed by JIAS in its 75-year history, to help in the immigration process and to help ease the transition into Canadian society.

For thousands of Jewish immigrants to Canada, JIAS has been one of the first points of contact with the Jewish community. Last year, 5,000 Jewish immigrants took advantage of vocational counselling, English language courses and advice on the immigration process.

While in Calgary in early December, Briks discussed resettlement issues, in an informal gathering of 25 recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union, along with Bonnie Osoff-Bultz, a Calgarian who sits on the JIAS national board, and Anna Steinberg, resettlement counsellor at Jewish Family Service in Calgary.

Topping the list of concerns, were questions about helping relatives apply for immigrant status, and job-related issues such as the difficulty of acquiring professional accreditation here.

Briks said that JIAS can aid in immigration applications, by writing to Canadian embassies abroad to explain that Jewish people who come to Canada will have the support of a caring community.

"JIAS can assure the Canadian government that Jewish people will not be wondering around aimlessly. And this can make a difference to the immigration process," Briks said.

He also said that JIAS is part of a coalition of groups that lobbies professional associations to accept the credentials of professionals trained abroad.

JIAS is also a sponsorship agreement holder for Jewish refugees, meaning that the organization can sponsor Jewish refugees directly, as was the case with many families from the former Yugoslavia who came to Canada five years ago.

The majority of Jewish immigrants to Canada in recent years have come from the former Soviet Union, but there is also a significant influx from South America, particularly from Brazil and Argentina, Briks said.

As to the Canadian government's regulations on immigration, Briks said that some changes are being considered that will be very positive. In the works, is a new procedure that will make life much easier for women in danger.

"There has always been consideration for women in difficult situations abroad, and for minority women or single parents. But now there is strong consideration for a program whereby women in imminent danger would be brought to Canada within 72 hours and processed in-land, rather than in their country of origin," Briks said. "This pilot project would be a major breakthrough in terms of humanitarian aid to women in dangerous situations."

Eyal Sartov is Israel's number one tennis champion. His toughest shot is his forehand topspin from the baseline. 'Opponents fear it the most' he says. And there is his psychological strength, which he believes is 'a tennis player's most precious asset.

Sartov is a double amputee below his knees. In 1978, he stepped on a mine left over from the Six Day War in the Golan Heights. Being a tennis pro means hard work, an exceptionally high level of discipline and being totally focused. Sartov trains twice a day at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv. He works out in the weight room almost 10 hours a week. He's on the court, in his special tennis wheelchair, with his coach, fine-tuning this cross court shots, perfecting his backhand, and enhancing that feared forehand topspin.

Study of Ashkenazi Jews may shed light on autism

By JOAN GROSS
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

STANFORD, Calif. — Stanford University researchers are hoping that Ashkenazi families can help them unlock some genetic secrets about autism.

The intensive study for which they are seeking participants is designed to help researchers locate genes that may cause autism, a disorder involving abnormal introversion and egocentricity.

This study targets autistic children in Ashkenazi families.

"Several studies have shown that Ashkenazi Jews have a unique genetic makeup," said Neil Risch, a genetic methodologist at Stanford. "This group is more homogeneous than many others. We hope to identify specific genes that predispose children to develop autism.

"By identifying those genes we can try to understand the general neurodevelopmental processes that lead to the development of autism."

He cautioned, however, that "there is no knowledge that autism is more common in Jews, and no studies on ethnic groups with autism have been done before."

Researchers are not looking for simple answers, Risch explained. "We don't think of autism as one dominant gene disorder. Autism is genetically more complicated. We are likely dealing with multiple genes. We have a strong suspicion that genetic factors play a part in autism."

Researchers not seeking simple answers

In order to qualify for the study, families must meet the following criteria:

- The child must be under 18, with a diagnosis of autistic disorder.
- Both parents and all four grandparents must be of Ashkenazi Jewish heritage (from central or eastern Europe).
- Both biological parents and the affected child must be willing and available to have a blood sample drawn.

The study, which has just begun, is multifaceted. In the clinical segment, families will be interviewed and receive individual diagnoses. In the lab, blood samples will be studied for molecular genetics. And in the statistical segment, all the data will be compiled and analyzed.

The Stanford Autism Research Program is an ongoing joint effort by researchers at the Stanford School of Medicine's department of psychiatry and behavioral sciences and department of genetics.

The research team in this study includes Risch, who specializes in statistical genetic design; Richard Myers, the program's co-principal investigator, who is responsible for the molecular genetics aspect; Dr. Helena Kraemer, biostatistician, who evaluates procedures; Donna Spiker, clinical director; and Dr. Linda Lotspeich, a child psychiatrist.

Spiker and Lotspeich are responsible for the clinical aspect of the project, which involves identifying and diagnosing the families.

"We have found that families of Ashkenazi descent are interested in this study for their own education and information," Spiker said. "They want to understand it from a rational and scientific viewpoint. Parents want to promote better understanding of this disorder so treatment can be successful."

During a diagnostic interview, researchers will ask parents very specific questions about the characteristics of the child with autism.

"We'll talk about specific socialization deficits, communication impairments and their routines in terms of their behavior and play," Lotspeich said.

The researchers will also visit and assess the children through interviews and observation.

"The willingness of the families involved to do all that is needed in a study like ours is truly gratifying," Spiker said. "It's important that families realize that research is a process, and they are partners with us."

Participation is not restricted to local families. "There is no cost to families and no travel is required," Spiker added. "The more families that participate, the better are the chances of localizing the genes for autism."

For information, contact Spiker: telephone 650-723-7809, or e-mail ms.dks@forsythe.stanford.edu.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Parents are always concerned about feeding their children. Here are some of the questions you've been asking about pediatric nutrition.

Q. I am expecting a baby next month and I am planning to bottle feed. I am wondering how long I will have to sterilize bottles and equipment.

A. The Canadian Pediatric Society recommends sterilizing for the first three to four months; however, this is something that you can discuss with your baby's doctor. Some doctors suggest sterilizing for up to six months.

Q. I am seven months pregnant and I am planning to bottle feed. How do I select a formula?

A. This is a question that puzzles many expectant mothers, as there are so many choices. If you have chosen a pediatrician or family doctor for your baby, you can check with him or her. Otherwise here are some steps to follow to help you decide.

You are probably best to choose a cow's milk-based formula that is iron fortified. However, if there is a strong family history of milk allergies or if you are planning for your baby to be a vegan vegetarian, then you may choose a soy formula. If the baby is full term, an iron-based formula may be used; if the baby is premature, follow the recommendations of the pediatrician.

Next, decide what form of formula you wish to use. Most infant formulas come in three forms: powder, ready-to-feed and liquid concentrate. All are equally nutritious, but some are slightly more convenient, depending on your needs.

For example, if you are breastfeeding and planning to supplement with formula, the powder is best because it has the longest shelf life once opened; it is usually the most economical.

If you find that you are limited in time to make formula, as new mothers often are, then the ready-to-feed or liquid concentrate may be best, as the prepared bottles usually last 48 hours in the fridge. Make sure that you read the directions carefully, as the shelf lives will vary between brands.

Feel free to call the 1-800 numbers offered by formula manufacturers. They are often very helpful and willing to send additional information.

When in doubt, you may wish to wait and see what formula your baby is put on in the hospital, and if the baby is tolerating it well, continue with this formula at home.

Syria, Russia planning 'massive' arms deal

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Syria is expected to conclude a massive arms deal with Russia later this month, one that strategic analysts say will significantly erode, though not actually destroy, Israel's qualitative military edge.

The deal, estimated to be worth between $2 billion and $3 billion (US), has been in the works for two years and is expected to be sealed when Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas leads a high level Syrian delegation to Moscow for 10 days of intensive talks in late February.

Among the Russian weapons systems Syria is reportedly seeking are Sukhoi-27 fighter aircraft, T-80 tanks, S-300 anti-aircraft and anti-missile Sam systems. The Sams are said to be equivalent to U.S. Patriot missiles.

According to one strategic analyst, the negotiations hit two snags before agreement was reached: The first was Syria's residual debt – estimated at some $12 billion – to the former Soviet Union; the second was its inability to finance fresh arms purchases.

Moscow signaled its willingness to find a solution to the debt problem when it approved the sale of 1,000 AT8 Kornet anti-tank missiles to Syria last year, a $200-million contract that has been described as "an appetizer" compared to the upcoming deal.

This latest deal will be significant for Syria on several counts, according to leading Arab strategic analyst Kassem Mohammad Jaafar.

On one level, he told the London-based daily newsletter Mideast Mirror, it would constitute the first major military deal Syria has concluded with Russia since the demise of the Soviet Union, marking the resumption of strategic cooperation between Damascus and Moscow.

On another level, the acquisition of state-of-the-art weapons by the Syrian armed forces would greatly enhance Syria's military capability, said Jaafar, who added that the Sukhoi-27 is regarded as equivalent, if not superior, to the U.S.-made F-15 fighter jets that Israel currently has in its arsenal.

Moreover, the T-80 is one of the newest generations of tanks, while the S-300 system would enable Syria to defend itself against both missile and air strikes.

Equally important are other aspects of the deal, which involve the supply of spare parts, the upgrading of weapons systems and the support and modernization of Syria's armed forces.

Moreover, the deal will return Russia as a major player in the Middle East, an ambition that is believed to have been accelerated since the appointment last September of veteran Arabist Yevgeny Primakov as Russian prime minister.

In a related development, British intelligence sources reported that sophisticated Russian technology is being transferred to Damascus to aid Syria's chemical weapons project.

Quoting intelligence sources, the London Times reported that unofficial secret links have been found between Russian technical experts and Syria, aimed at helping Damascus produce advanced chemical weapons.

"It is now feared that sophisticated Russian technology has been passed to Syria by former members of Moscow's chemical weapons project," the article said.

Through unofficial exchanges with these experts, Syria is thought to have acquired the technology for dispersing chemical agents, including VX nerve gas, via bombs from aircraft and warheads on surface-to-surface missiles.

Syrian Scud C ballistic missiles with a range of some 325 miles are believed to have been adapted to disperse VX gas. The Syrians have also reportedly shown interest in acquiring more lethal chemicals that were developed in Russia in the 1980s.

Until the mid-1990s, Syria focused on the production of sarin nerve gas, but Damascus is now developing VX independently and is believed to have test-fired missiles armed with this agent. One test was reported to have been conducted near Damascus last May.

European Union warns Arafat

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The European Union (EU) has recently warned Yasser Arafat that Europe would freeze the transfer of financial assistance to the Palestinian Authority if the PA does not explain the disappearance of funds sent over the last two years.

Sources in the European parliament in Strasbourg told Ha'aretz that the ambiguous financial statements that the PA has presented have raised serious suspicions of embezzlement by Arafat's close associates.

The sources disclosed that the freeze will be announced next week in Frankfurt when the joint Palestinian-EU committee meets. At the meeting, representatives of the PA are supposed to submit a report explaining the missing funds. The EU's senior representative on the committee, Minister Manuel Marin, has received instructions not to be lenient this time and immediately announce a freeze in funding if suspicions of misappropriation persist.

Israel Election Notebook

May 17

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was officially chosen by the Likud party to run as its candidate for prime minister in the election.

Some 160,000 Likud members were eligible to participate in the vote. Netanyahu handily defeated Moshe Arens.

Arens accepted the prime minister's offer to become minister of defence in place of Yitzhak Mordechai.

• Veteran member of Knesset, Dedi Zucker failed to get a spot on the Meretz party list. Zucker caused a storm in the party after he met with members of the Shas party to discuss a new approach to resolving "religious-secular" issues dividing Israeli society.

•The FBI asked Israeli police to help analyse fingerprints in the burglarized offices of political consultant Stanley Greenberg, who had been hired to advise Ehud Barak.

• Amnon Lipkin-Shahak is raising money in the United States for his new, as yet unnamed centrist party. Shahak was also scheduled to visit Montreal as part of his fundraising.

• MK Haim Ramon is once again rethinking his future in the Labor party, after its central committee went back on an earlier decision regarding the voting in the primary elections.

The Week in Israel

Jan. 25

• Israel security officials rejected an Iraqi offer to sell crude oil to Israel at 50 percent below the market price, Ha'aretz reported. The proposal was reportedly conveyed to former energy minister Moshe Shahal by a Palestinian businessman.

Jan. 26

• The Knesset passed legislation intended to block Conservative and Reform representatives from serving on local religious councils. The bill, approved by a 50-49 vote, requires all representatives on councils to accept the rulings of the Chief Rabbinate.

• The Knesset rejected a "religious freedom" bill that included a provision to recognize civil marriages and divorces performed in Israel. The vote was 43-28.

• The Knesset, by 53-30, passed a law requiring a national referendum and a special parliamentary majority to approve any withdrawal from land under its sovereignty such as the Golan Heights and eastern Jerusalem.

Jan. 27

• The Knesset voted 10-4 on preliminary approval of a bill aimed at annexing Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. Knesset speaker Dan Tichon and other members of the Knesset severely criticized the proponents of the bill for holding the vote when most members were absent.

Jan. 28

• The Supreme Court gave the Jerusalem religious council 10 days to uphold a court order to convene with Reform and Conservative representatives. The court also fined the council some $10,000 (Cdn) in legal expenses for failing to comply with earlier such rulings.

• Israel's foreign minister, Ariel Sharon, rejected holding a trilateral meeting with American and Palestinian officials.

Jan. 29

• An elderly woman was killed and 31 other passengers injured, when an Egged bus overturned on the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway after skidding on the wet road.

Iranian weapons programs alarm Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Exactly 20 years ago, in a momentous event which convulsed the modern Middle East, Iran's pro-Western monarchy, led by Shah Mohammed Riza, collapsed under the weight of a nation-wide rebellion.

The revolution ushered in a fervently Islamic regime headed by its acetic spiritual leader, the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini. He returned to Teheran after a long exile in France, setting into motion a radical transformation of Iran's society and of Iranian foreign policy.

The political earthquake affected all the countries of the region, but no more so than Israel. In short order, Iran severed ties with Israel, turned over the Israeli embassy to the PLO, and joined the ranks of the Arab rejectionist front.

Since then, Iran has emerged as one of Israel's prime foes. Indeed, two prime ministers, Yitzhak Rabin and Benjamin Netanyahu, have said that, in Iran, Israel has never faced a more concrete strategic threat to its existence.

Not everyone agrees with their assessment. Syria, which unlike Iran shares a common border with Israel, remains a formidable adversary. Iraq, though presently weak, could again be a potent anti-Israel force in the future.

That being said, Iran has steadily become a threat to Israel's security, a fierce critic of the Oslo peace process, as well as an ardent supporter of Hamas and Hezbollah. With the help of Russia, China and North Korea, Iran is developing a missile capability, having successfully tested a medium-range missile last summer, and is striving to build a nuclear arsenal.

These developments have stirred tension. Last September, Ephraim Sneh – a former general and cabinet minister and presently a Labor party Knesset member – suggested a pre-emptive military strike against Iran, arguing that American efforts to prevent Iran from acquiring missile technology and nuclear reactors had failed.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai rejected Sneh's proposal. But Iran's defence minister, Ali Shamkhani, shot back, declaring that Iran would retaliate "in a manner beyond the Israelis wildest dreams" if Israel tried to destroy its Russian-built nuclear reactor, or attacked Syria, its ally. Shamkhani's vitriol, though harsh, was hardly surprising. Just a month earlier, he intimated that Iran's military buildup was aimed at Israel.

In its bid to be a regional power, as it was under the shah, Iran has poured billions of dollars of its oil wealth into acquiring conventional and non-conventional weapons.

What alarms Israel most are Iran's missile and nuclear programs, not its attempts to rebuild its army, air force and navy. Iran's Shihab-3 missile, with a range of 1,300 kilometres, can reach targets in Israel. And now Iran is tinkering with an improved model, the Shihab-4. Israel is using diplomacy to deal with the problem. Russia and China have pledged not to pass on technology to Iran that could be used to manufacture weapons of mass destruction. But Israel knows it cannot rely on such promises.

Iran claims that its nuclear reactors are for peaceful purposes, but Israel is doubtful about its intentions. Iran has lobbied Pakistan – which detonated a nuclear device last year – for nuclear technology. Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharazi visited Islamabad last June, but it remains to be seen whether Pakistan will accede to Iran's request.

In the meantime, Iran is redoubling its efforts to bolster its chemical weapons program. Last year, an Israeli businessman, Nahum Manbar, was imprisoned for supplying Iran with chemical weapons materiel. This is not as strange as it sounds. During the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq war, Teheran bought military hardware from Israel.

Iran's new president, Mohammed Khatami, a moderate by Iranian standards, has moved toward greater acceptance of the Oslo negotiations. But he still refers to Israel as a "racist and terrorist regime," and Iran's hardline supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khameini, is vehemently opposed to Oslo. Viewed in this perspective, Iran is doubtless one of Israel's chief enemies.

Russia's Communist leader takes swipe at Jews

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — As the international community continues to probe Russian extremism, the issue of anti-Semitism among Russia's political leaders is flaring up again.

Responding to accusations that his party is anti-Semitic, the leader of the Communist Party took a thinly veiled swipe at Jews and other minorities once again last week. Speaking to journalists in Paris, Gennady Zyuganov said people with "non-Russian-sounding last names" are undermining Russia's "distinctive character."

Zyuganov also condemned "those forces that are consciously stirring up ethnic conflicts" in Russia and again blamed Russia's troubles on ethnic non-Russians in previous governments.

Zyuganov's comments came just before the UN commissioner for human rights announced he is launching a probe into anti-Semitic remarks recently made by members of the Russian Communist Party. The commissioner plans to issue a report on the matter in March, according to the World Jewish Congress.

Those remarks also came during U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's two-day visit to Moscow. She said anti-Semitism is one of the critical issues facing Russia as it confronts its ongoing economic crisis.

Albright offered this assessment during a meeting with lawmakers, religious leaders and representatives of human rights groups. She also said the United States is looking closely at how Russia handles the issues of religious freedom and political extremism.

Jewish leaders and human rights groups in Russia and the United States applauded Albright's effort to raise these issues during her visit.

Albright's "forceful and principled defense of human rights and civil society as central to Russia's development does great honor to our entire nation," said Yosef Abramowitz, president of the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews.

Jewish groups are speaking out with increased urgency on anti-Semitism in Russia, which has increased since Russia's economy went into a tailspin last year.

It is unclear whether Zyuganov's comments were directed exclusively at Jews. But given the prominence of some Jews in the previous administrations of Russian President Boris Yeltsin, it is difficult to imagine that he was excluding Jews from his attack.

The Communist leader has several times referred to the disproportionately high percentage of Jews in Russia's government and has condemned Zionism, which he said is part of a global conspiracy.

As Russia attempts to cope with its gravest economic crisis since the fall of Communism in 1991, Zyuganov is not the only lawmaker to make anti- Semitic slurs.

Two hard-line Communist legislators, Viktor Ilyukhin and Albert Makashov, created controversy last fall when they blamed the economic crisis on Jews. They recently announced they would split from the Communists in parliamentary elections slated for December.

The deputies said they would campaign under the banner of the Movement in Support of the Army, which Ilyukhin now heads. Ironically, this movement was created by Lev Rokhlin, a Russian Jewish general who emerged as a hero during the war in southern Russia's breakaway republic of Chechnya. Later known as a bitter critic of Yeltsin, Rokhlin was shot dead last summer.

Ilyukhin has said his group would pursue a common program with the Communists.

Zyuganov expressed support for the split, saying the opposition would provide several options for voters.

Meanwhile, scant progress has been reported in the Kremlin's campaign against political extremism and anti-Semitism. Last fall, Russian leaders, including Yeltsin, promised to curb hate crimes in the wake of an outcry that began after the Communist Party, the largest bloc in Parliament, blocked a motion in the body's lower house to censure Makashov for his anti-Semitic comments.

Nikolai Bordyuzha, secretary of the Security Council, called on the leaders of the Russian mass media to play a more responsible role in the dissemination of information on political extremism.

Last week, Russian authorities launched an inspection in some areas of the country to confiscate printed, audio and video materials aimed at "propagating fascism, inciting social, racial, ethnic and religious discord."

Earlier this month, the Russian cabinet approved a draft bill to outlaw statements that fuel ethnic strife. This bill seeks to make political parties responsible for members who make extremist statements.

According to Justice Minister Pavel Krasheninnikov, a party must either disavow such statements made by its members or face an official ban.

However, experts say the bill in its current form, has little chance of being passed in Parliament. The Communist-dominated Duma, parliament's lower house, is expected to oppose the bill, which Communist lawmakers say mainly targets their party.

Despite all the grim news, the results of a recent opinion poll suggest that a large-scale media campaign against extremism and ultranationalism is yielding results.

According to the nationwide poll of 1,500 Russians, 36 percent of the respondents said fascists – a term used in the Russian media that encompasses ultranationalists and anti-Semites – provoke their greatest outrage and irritation.

A similar poll in 1997 showed that 24 percent of Russians were outraged by fascists. Four percent of the respondents in the new poll showed intolerance to Jews, compared with three percent in 1997.

The poll was conducted by the Public Opinion Foundation, a leading Moscow polling firm. No margin of error for the survey has been reported.

Aliyah from FSU down

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — When economic conditions deteriorated here in the middle of 1998, some Russian Jewish officials spoke about a possible exodus of Jews to Israel.

That exodus failed to materialize, but emigration from Russia did increase during the last few months of 1998, according to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics.

Some 46,020 immigrants arrived in the Jewish state from Russia and the other former Soviet republics in 1998, according to the bureau, compared with 54,621 in 1997.

But while this rate represents a decrease of 16 percent, the number who emigrated from Russia to Israel is down by only six percent, to 14,450.

The wave of emigration that started in 1989, when restrictions were eased in the former Soviet Union, has brought a total of about three-quarters of a million people to Israel. But the influx has tapered off during the past few years.

If the rate of emigration that occurred at the beginning of 1998 remained constant, aliyah from Russia would have been down by 15 percent for the year, said Alla Levy, head of the Russia office of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Those regions where the rate of aliyah increased – the Samara region in central Russia, where aliyah increased by 18 percent last year; the central part of Siberia, where the rate of emigration to Israel was up by nine percent; and the formerly autonomous region of Birobidzhan, where the rate increased by an astronomical 101 percent – are places where the economic downturn is particularly acute, said Levy.

By the end of 1998, Levy said, increasing numbers of Russian immigrants were citing anti-Semitism as their major motivation.

Levy added that the increase in aliyah Israel witnessed during the last part of 1998 is expected to continue.

Subway scenes, human figures interest Toronto urban artist

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The man on the subway is engrossed in his newspaper, oblivious of the other passengers. It's an everyday scene but this is a painting – so real that a vacant seat beckons to the viewer.

The work is from Hillel Kagan's Subway Paintings, exhibited recently at D & E Lake, at Yonge and Summerhill.

A frequent subway rider, Kagan describes the train as "a room moving through space and time."

He is a Torontonian who has lived in various parts of the city and is by his own definition, an urban artist. "I don't do flowers," he notes with a grin.

Using oils, he details his own forceful reality, constructing it brushstroke upon brushstroke from the flat canvas, often ignoring the device of perspective. "I paint what I see," he says.

Particularly interested in the human figure, his mastery is especially evident in another series, Struggling Figures, a concept triggered by 1930s photo illustrations of wrestling and ju-jitsu holds. These pictures belonged to his father, who was once an amateur wrestler.

The backdrop of the Struggling Figures series is the contained space of the house where his father used to live, which is now occupied by his own family. Here Kagan has created demanding paintings in bold, saturated color, personal in nature, embodying, he says "both the struggle of family life within the home, a struggle not violent, but more a dance or enactment with all the participants knowing their roles, and the struggle of modern figurative painting – the resolution of conflict between abstract and real, flatness and illusion."

Kagan's works are multi-dimensional in thought. He spends an extraordinary length of time in his studio, he says. "I wish I could just pop them off, but I can't."

Looking into them we discover more and more.

He also does "unstill still lifes" – a bottle of wine just waiting to be poured, shoes and boots shaped by their wearers. "I want my paintings to be alive!" he insists.

Though he is clearly an individualist, he draws strength from an alliance known simply as Eight. This is not a group in the sense of style focus, but a number of informed artists sharing friendship, respect and the conviction of painting's expressive power. Their mentor was Canadian art icon William Ronald, who died in 1998.

Since the '70s, Kagan has exhibited in such venues as Hart House's Justina M. Barnicke Gallery, Rodman Hall Arts Centre in St. Catharines, the Albert Latner Jewish Library and others in the Toronto area. His works are in corporate and private collections in Canada, the United States and Israel.

Canadian firms among leaders in Jubilee Awards

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canada had the third highest number of corporate recipients of Jubilee Awards, which were presented at the Prime Minister's Jubilee Business Summit in Jerusalem.

Six Canadian firms were among the 78 international companies, some of them the world's most powerful multinationals, listed for the Jubilee Award, honoring firms that have conducted $50 million (US) or more in commerce in Israel.

The attendance of some of Canada's most powerful business leaders, combined with the presence of Ontario Premier Mike Harris, gave Canada a high-profile role at the October business summit, according to Richard Venn, chairman and CEO of CIBC Wood Gundy World Markets and a co-chair of the Canadian delegation.

"Canada was extremely well represented. We had the highest ranking political representative in [Harris]."

Venn pointed out that the strength of the delegation reflects this country's commitment to Israel.

"We had a lot of great access to all the senior ministers. The conference went well. It was extremely well-organized...I think Canada displayed itself extremely well. I'm very proud of the team."

Venn's division of the CIBC is a major player in raising capital for Israeli high technology firms, he said.

Novel explores 'crazy universe'

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

Like The Diary of Anne Frank, Lucille de Saint-André's partly-autobiographical novel Bye-Bye, Baden-Baden tells the story of a Jewish teenager's attempt to make sense of the world during the Holocaust.

But unlike Anne Frank, Uschi, the 16-year-old heroine of this novel, was fortunate – or at least less unfortunate.

The Gestapo rounds up Uschi, her parents and younger brother from their home in Baden-Baden, Germany, and sends them to a camp. However, the family manages to secure passage to Marseilles, France where they are given six months to obtain a visa to the United States or be "resettled East."

From France they travel to Spain where they eventually board the Baleares, which will take them to the United States. Much of the novel takes place on board the ship.

Most of the point of view of Bye-Bye is Uschi's. We see life unfolding on this ship through her relationships with other people.

She quickly observes the attempt at normalizing life on Baleares. One of the many characters aboard is Stanislaus Steinheil, a married German with "two pudgy offspring." Steinheil, a bully of the first degree, resents that all passengers have access to the sunny deck, regardless of their previous class.

"Steinheil paced around the decks topside and discovered he deeply resented the presence of people sitting in deck-chairs and breathing in fresh sea air for which they had not paid. They should be in steerage, he felt, with the rest of the riff-raff."

He is one of a strange mix of people who turn the ship into a microcosm of the world, among them, Tamara, a 24-year old who got engaged to a Spanish diplomat in Cuba because her visa expired; Alexander Hirsch, a movie director who dreams of making it big in Hollywood; a Russian countess and her hen-pecked husband; and a mysterious American journalist.

Perhaps like any teenager, Uschi's descriptions of life as a refugee in Marseille and on the ship are almost romantic. While her parents are worrying about their fate, Uschi is enjoying herself, flirting and fraternizing.

"Uschi loved Marseilles. The sun, the sea, the palm-lined Corniche snaking along the Mediterranean made her almost drunk with freedom. She loved to squeeze into the crowded tram and gaze out at the sun-woven water...ignoring a pinch or two from one of the intrepid, misguided Arabs."

Later, waiting for the ship in Spain, "Life was perfect. The Spanish boys were perfect, as handsome as the young pilots in camp, so good-looking that she never knew who to admire first."

In fact, it seems the only thing that really bothers her on the ship is a nasty rash she gets on her face when she stays out in the sun too long. But in her search to come to terms with her own sexuality, spirituality and familial responsibility, Uschi is mostly coming to grips with her own survival.

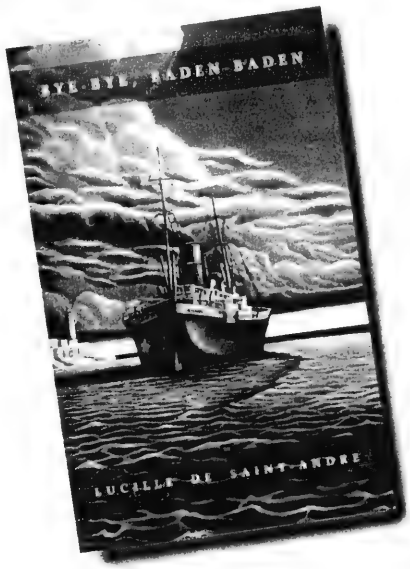
"But she needed a reason to live. Beneath the chaos in her mind, well-protected and nurtured, there was a huge, orderly demand for a reason to continue living. She wanted an explanation for a crazy universe...She wanted to see what lay ahead at the end of the trip. It was the same urge that had made her decide against suicide the day the Gestapo came for her family."

Saint-André, who escaped from Europe in much the same way as her heroine Uschi, now lives in Toronto. She admits the book is partly autobiographical with " a lot of made-up stuff."

Her first novel has some flaws. The narrative structure, especially early in the book, where the setting switches randomly from Germany to France to Spain to the ship, makes it a bit hard to follow. There's also a fair amount of unnecessary digression.

But as a psychological study into the mind of an adolescent coming to terms with her existence during a horrific era, this book succeeds.

Bye-Bye Baden-Baden ($18.75) is published by ECW Press in Toronto.



Israel's Jubilee Awards

er, through CIBC Oppenheimer, which is our U.S. division, of Israeli technology companies on the NASDAQ.

"We trade more of those companies' shares than anyone else. We're extremely active in the capital markets there."

Venn said he was impressed with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's role in the conference.

"He extended himself tremendously to really make the thing work. He was a phenomenal host and very inspirational to the conference."

Part of the Prime Minister's Jubilee Business Summit was the handing out of the Jubilee Awards.

Recipients attending were given a statue by an Israeli artist and a letter from the prime minister.

The Israeli government is also looking for a way to send the awards to the remainder of the 78 corporate recipients who were not represented at the summit, said Yael Varsano-Barzilay of the Israel Economic Mission in Toronto.

The United States had the highest number of recipients with 40 awards, while England ranked second with eight.

The Canadian companies honored at the Jubilee summit were Canpro Investment Ltd., Canadian Highways International Corporation, New Bridge Networks Corporation, Hollinger International Inc., Northern Telecom Inc. and Seagram.

The summit included a wide range of plenary sessions, speeches and networking sessions to enhance business opportunities in Israel for foreign and Israeli companies.

Theaturtle debuts The Song

BY BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Adam Nashman

TORONTO — Though they have the same surname and are both Jewish, and they attended the University of Toronto (U of T) at the same time, Adam and Alon Nashman, the co-founders of Theaturtle, are not related and did not meet until three years ago.

They are the only A. Nashmans in the Toronto phone book.

"Alon's resume came to me along with all the others and I heard this guy singing in the audition room," said Adam, who was casting for The Song, his own play. It opens at Theatre Passe Muraille Backspace, at 16 Ryerson Ave., on Feb. 17 and runs to March 7.

To shorten a long story, Alon has the lead in the play based on the biblical Song of Songs, which is Theaturtle's inaugural production.

Adam had more than a passing interest in meeting Alon, because as a freshman at U. of T. he trundled over to Robarts Library to borrow a book for the first time only to learn that an A. Nashman owed $70 in back fines for overdue books.

Born in Prague, of Jewish parents, Adam, 30, was adopted at an early age, and came to Canada 27 years ago. The Song took three years to write, and in the words of the company's press release is "about love, sex and the soul's journey."

Adam thinks it will appeal to a lot of his friends who are not regular synagogue-goers but who are looking for a spiritual mission in life, he says.

"Like the Song of Songs indicates, sex is a good way to start. It's universal and when it's right, it's good. It reveals much about the sacred aspect of sex, as well as the erotic essence of prayer."

In Adam's opinion, it is not necessary to know anything about the Song of Songs to enjoy the play and get "a totally modern message from it."

Along with Deborah Hay, Alon plays many other characters in The Song, and both sing lyrics to the music composed by Debrashis Sinha.

The play tells the story of Alan, an accountant and scholar, haunted by the death of his wife. He is unable to work and to love since his wife's death two years earlier.

Ancient and timeless teachers, Rabbi Akiva, talmudic defender of the Song of Songs and King Solomon, its author, visit Alan who undergoes a transformation of mind, body and spirit.

"Alon is much more concerned with Jewishness than I am and at his request, to which I agreed, the play will not be performed on the Sabbath," Adam says.

Previews run from Feb. 13 to 16. (416) 504-7529.

Entertainer chose dance over law

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After actress, singer, dancer and choreographer Sid Kroach, 27, co-starring in Tony n' Tina's Wedding at Vinnie Black's Chapel of Love, won a starring role in a university play, she opted to practice dance instead of law.

"I took theatre at McGill University in Montreal. In my final year, I was thinking about law school but there was a set of auditions for shows. I struck myself a deal. I knew that the cast lists were going up the next day. I decided if I didn't get a part I would start studying for my [law school admission test] to prepare for law school. I ended up getting the lead in Cold Comfort."

After McGill, Kroach entered Sheridan College in Oakville for the triple threat program – singing, acting and dancing. She was accepted at a school in New York but decided to study closer to home. In retrospect, she's very happy about her decision, because now her focus is geared to working on Canadian shows and promoting Canadian talent. If her craft ever took her to Broadway, she would go, but she is very content to work in Toronto.

She excelled at school, winning two James McGill Scholarships for Academic Achievement, the coveted Christopher Covert Award for Improvisation and the Ben McPeek Award for Musical Theatre Performance.

She has performed in a number of theatrical productions including Nunsense 3 at the Rainbow Theatre in Parry Sound, Come Back To The Five & Dime with the Scarborough Players, Barefoot In The Park at the Heritage Theatre in Brampton, and Loose Cannons, Street Theatre Improv at Ontario Place.

As the host of Legends, Paramount On Ice at Canada's Wonderland, Kroach played the flying ghost who haunted Paramount Theatre. When the fly track broke, she had to improvise by walking on the ice. Unfortunately, her character had to wear high heeled spikes.

Sid Kroach

Kroach has also done some choreography and some TV commercials.

"Theatre is my true passion, because everything is in the moment. You can't go back and do it over, you're there and the audience is going through it at the same time. It's an electrical connection that's not the same when you're doing film," says Kroach.

Last summer, Kroach worked at the now troubled theatre company, Livent. She worked for a month on Fosse, while it was in workshop. Much to her delight, Kroach spent a lot of time chauffeuring Bob Fosse's ex-wife, dance legend Gwen Verdon, around town.

"I think the state of Canadian theatre is in flux. It's been a tough year, but I'm hoping we're at a point of turn around and that more smaller theatres will be established."

Tony n' Tina's Wedding is best described as a mix of The Godfather and The Carol Burnett Show. Kroach does double duty as the choreographer and playing Connie Mocogni, a very pregnant maid of honor, who's not a big fan of weddings.

"It's an Italian-Canadian wedding; the audience is invited. Guests go to the ceremony, the dinner and even get to dance and have characters join them at their table. It's a totally interactive show."

Tony n' Tina's Wedding opens on February 9 for an indefinite run every Wednesday to Sunday. Vinnie Black's Chapel of Love is located in the Second City Building at 56 Blue Jays Way. Tickets cost from $55-$60. Call Ticketmaster at 872-1111. For groups of 10 or more, call 343-0077.

STORYTELLER FOCUSES ON REBBE NACHMAN

Rebbe Nachman of Breslov (1772-1810), a grandson of the Baal Shem Tov, told rich, dream-like stories, filled with images from Jewish lore, the Bible, the Kabbalah and his own dreams. In weaving such tales, Rebbe Nachman also wove a reputation for himself as one of the great storytellers of the Jewish people.

A close disciple of Rebbe Nachman wrote down many of the stories, and they were published in 1814. Now a Toronto storyteller and rabbinical student, Justin Lewis, is preparing to retell one of the longer stories, The Seven Beggars, in an afternoon event that is part of the 21st Annual Toronto Festival of Storytelling. The event unfolds Feb. 21 from 1 to 5 p.m. at the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre, 179A Danforth Ave., Toronto.

The Seven Beggars actually contains many stories within stories, so listeners don't have to stay for the entire program of four hours, Lewis says. But those who do remain should find it a highly rewarding experience.

Rebbe Nachman's stories "are quite a bit like traditional folk tales and fairy tales, but they don't have the simple plots and motivations of most folk tales," Lewis says. "They're really much more dream-like in that the point of view is always shifting and the images are always changing from one thing to another."

A 37-year-old doctoral student and professional storyteller, Lewis has been studying chassidic stories for years. As he works towards his PhD from the University of Toronto, he is simultaneously studying at a New York rabbinical academy. He is the recipient of a fellowship from New York's YIVO Institute, where he is scheduled to present a lecture in the fall.

Lewis's aim in presenting The Seven Beggars is "to restore the stories to the way they were first presented in the world. It's very clear that these weren't written stories originally. They were spontaneous stories that were orally told." The meditative atmosphere he hopes to achieve will be enhanced through the singing of niggunim, or wordless chassidic prayers, led by Michael Sidlofsky. Lewis will also include some other poetic teachings of Rebbe Nachman.

If you enjoy Jewish storytelling, you won't want to miss this rare opportunity to hear this authentic English version of The Seven Beggars, based on the Yiddish and Hebrew text. Suggested admission $7 or PWYC. "Beggars free." 538-4060.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fifth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 25. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 11, 1999. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 18, 1999.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 25, 1999. Many of the drawings submitted to us will be put on display at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Business Profile

Lawyer believes ethics and business do mix

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It pays to be honest.

Corporate North America is discovering this simple, timeless, compelling truth, according to Mark Schwartz, a lawyer who teaches business law and business ethics at York University.

He believes that ethics and profitability are inextricably intertwined, although he acknowledges that studies have yet to confirm this thesis in any scientific fashion.

"Companies should be interested in ethics," said Schwartz, who recently co-chaired the first Jewish business ethics forum in Canada at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation in Toronto. "It's the right thing to do, regardless of the consequences."

In purely pragmatic terms, ethics can be squared with the almighty bottom line.

"Research shows that there is correlation between corporate ethical behavior and its impact on consumers, employees and shareholders," explained Schwartz, author of Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Corporate Codes of Ethics, But Were Afraid to Ask (Bentley College).

Corporations which engage in inappropriate behavior, be it price fixing, bid rigging, misleading advertising, deceptive marketing or the use of child labor, risk public relations problems, boycotts and diminishing morale among employees.

And Schwartz has found, companies which treat their employees decently can usually count on better performances from them.

As for shareholders, they now realize that a company steeped in ethics can avoid costly and onerous government intervention.

Corporations and governments, in his view, are increasingly aware of their ethical responsibilities.

The Conference Board of Canada has established a Corporate Responsibility and Ethics Council which meets regularly to discuss business ethics issues.

Not to be left behind, the federal government has come out with a voluntary International Code of Ethics for Canadian Business. Several corporations, including Alcan Aluminum and Shell Canada, have endorsed the code.

A little more than a year ago, Canada was among a group of countries which adopted the Convention for Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions. Canada, he noted, will soon amend its criminal code or introduce new legislation making bribery an explicit criminal offence.

Canada has suffered its share of scandals, from the Bre-X fiasco to the Westray mine disaster. But compared to Nigeria, Indonesia, Mexico and Russia, Canada ranks low in the prevalence of corporate corruption, a byproduct of lax or nonexistent ethical business standards.

There is, Schwartz argued, a causal link between corruption and economic development.

"The poorer a country, the greater the corruption." Bribes and payoffs are common in places where the salaries of civil servants are pitiful. Yet, in underdeveloped countries with strong democratic traditions and judicial systems, corruption tends to be less severe.

Whistle blowers – the bane of dishonest employers – sometimes tend to be motivated by religious convictions, Schwartz said.

Mark Schwartz

Indeed, studies reveal that religion may be a factor in influencing ethical behavior.

Jewish law, he explained, addresses not only aspects of daily life, but also how one should conduct one's business.

Schwartz and Meir Tamari, director of the Centre for Business Ethics at the Jerusalem College of Technology and former chief economist of the Bank of Israel, have compiled a halachic corporate code of ethics.

They write: "Each of us, as human beings, and as managers and employees, have a natural desire for wealth and profits, known as our yetzer (natural inclination), similar to our need for sex, food and clothing. Although such needs are legitimate, they must operate within a certain moral framework. The goal is to channel this yetzer into permitted and moral parameters so that this wealth may be kosher."

With that credo as their point of departure, Schwartz and Tamari proceed to define ethical behavior in terms of pricing, selling practices, conflicts of interest, competitive practices, repayment of debts, and the like.

Last November, Schwartz and Rabbi Jay Kelman of Beth Jacob Synagogue, co-organized Money, Morality & the Marketplace, a one-day conference which featured such speakers as Tamari and Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz, dean of Toronto's Ohr Somayach.

"More questions were raised than were necessarily answered," said Schwartz, recapping the results of the conference. Nevertheless, he hopes it will not be the last one of its kind.

"Some claim that business ethics is a fad," he observed. "If it is, it's the longest-running fad in history."

The topic is addressed not only in the Talmud and the Torah, but in the Koran and the New Testament.

In modern times, the Watergate scandal, which prompted Richard Nixon's resignation as president of the United States in 1974, inspired the first national conference on business ethics in the United States. The event was held at Bentley College in Waltham, Mass., in 1976.

Since then, universities have paid far more attention to business ethics. American institutions like Harvard and the University of Pennsylvania now offer business ethics programs. In Canada, the University of Toronto was the first to make business ethics mandatory for students pursuing master of business administration degrees.

Three Canadian universities – York University, University of Toronto and the University of British Columbia – have funded chairs in business ethics.

Schwartz claims that York University's Schulich School of Business was the first to create such a chair. It is held by Wesley Cragg, Schwartz's PhD supervisor.

Last year, Schwartz, 33, turned in a successful dissertation entitled The Relationship Between Corporate Codes of Ethics and Behavior. To the best of his knowledge, he is the first person in Canada to have obtained a PhD in business ethics. (His friend, Neil Shankman, who expects to receive his doctorate within two years, may well be the second).

Born in Toronto, the son of Albert, a chartered accountant, and Eileen, an elementary school teacher, Schwartz studied political science at York before entering its joint MBA/law program. After articling at Goodman and Carr, he was called to the bar in 1993.

He enjoyed law, but his heart was really in teaching. After connecting with Cragg, he knew he had discovered his real calling.

No longer a practicing lawyer, Schwartz is now associate director of business ethics at the Schulich School of Business. By design or coincidence, Jordan, his younger brother, is currently completing an MBA there. His sisters Lisa and Karen, are teachers in Israel and the United States respectively.

Last December, after receiving a postdoctoral fellowship from the Hebrew University, Schwartz and his family (wife Iris and children Michaela and Shalom) headed off to Israel for one year.

"I will be conducting research on business ethics within the Israeli corporate community," he said in an interview about a month before he left.

Eager to live in Israel again after spending a year at the Hebrew University in 1985-86 as an exchange student, Schwartz said he is looking forward to the experience.

He'll be working with his old colleague, Tamari, as well as with Daniel Attas of the Hebrew University and Dove Israeli of Tel Aviv University.

Schwartz, whose own personal integrity brought him to this growing discipline, thinks that he can make a difference.

As he put it: "I can have a positive impact on society."

What more can one ask?

New book tells the story of immigrants' fears, hopes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Most North Americans came here as immigrants. Some came from Europe, some from Asia, some from Africa or South America. There are those who came to escape persecution, and others who just wanted a better life.

It is hard to imagine what it must be like to leave everything and everybody that you know and go to a strange country where the life is often very different, where you don't know the language, and where you have to start a new life. Even the weather is different.

Many who came to the United States, including many, many Jews, came through Ellis Island, an immigrant processing centre near New York City. Here, they were examined to be sure they were healthy, and questioned about whether they had someplace to go, and if they had some means of support.

While for most people this was a temporary stop, Ellis Island was also known as the Island of Tears, because if someone was found to be unadmissable, they had to turn around and go back where they came from, a real hardship, if not actually dangerous.

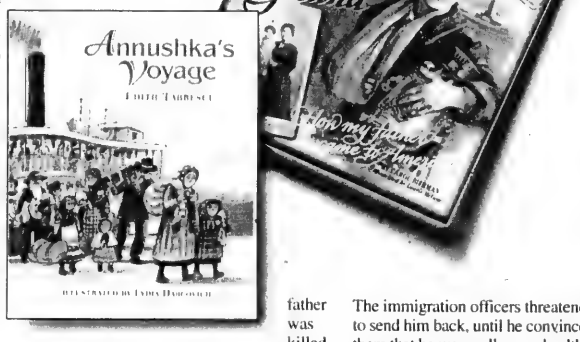
Two books have been published in the last little while that tell the story of the immigration to America. Annushka's Voyage, by Edith Tarbescu, with illustrations by Lydia Dabcovich (Clarion Books, 1998) is for children from about 8 to 10 years old, while preteens will enjoy Journey to Ellis Island, by Carol Bierman, illustrated by Laurie McGaw (Hyperion/Madison, 1998).

Annushka, the heroine of Annushka's Voyage, lives in a small village in Russia with her grandparents and her younger sister Tanya. Their mother had died, and their father had gone to America, and was saving money to bring the two girls to live with him.

After two years, he sent them steamship tickets, and they sadly kissed their grandparents goodbye, and set off on their long journey. Besides their clothes, they each carried one of their grandmother's Shabbat candlesticks.

The trip was very long and difficult. First, they had to take a train to Holland, and then spend two weeks in the very lowest desk of the ship, called steerage, until they got to America.

Can you imagine travelling all the way from Russia without a grown-up, or anyone you knew? How scared Annushka and Tanya must have been. In fact, several times, if it hadn't been for the candlesticks, they might have lost each other.



Journey to Ellis Island is what is called historical fiction – something that really happened, but that is told like a story.

Yehuda Weinstein is a young boy in Russia during and just after World War I. His father was killed in the war, and his older sister died from a shrapnal wound. Life was very hard for the family.

Luckily, Yehuda's older brother had already left for America, and he sent the rest of the family money to join him. Like Annushka and Tanya, Yehuda, his younger sister Esther and his mother Rachel, travelled in steerage from Holland until they landed in Ellis Island.

The book describes the different examinations immigrants had to go through until they could assure the officials that they wouldn't be a burden on society.

Unfortunately, Yehuda had lost part of his ring finger to a German bullet, and he had his arm in a sling. The immigration officers threatened to send him back, until he convinced them that he was really very healthy.

This book also talks about what happened to the family when they finally landed, how Yehuda's name was changed to Julius at school, and how the family established itself and prospered.

Both Annushka's Voyage and Journey to Ellis Island show the fear, the excitement, the hopes and the dreams of those who immigrated to America.

While there was nothing like Ellis Island in Canada, immigrants often landed either at Montreal or in Halifax. Pier One, in Halifax, where the immigrants landed and were checked by government officials, is now being restored as a historic landmark.

B.C. athlete jumps to the top in sport aerobics

Ross finishes fourth in Canadian championship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At age 23, Tami Ross is the real deal: strong and agile as a gymnast, graceful and poised like a dancer.

Lucky for her, she recently discovered a sport that allows her to combine those elements and perform on a national stage.

Ross is a practitioner of "sport aerobics," not exactly a brand-new out- of-the-box sport, but one that has only recently started to attract the attention of fans and sports television networks in Canada and the United States.

Two weeks ago, in only her second major competition, Ross finished fourth out of 13 athletes in the Open Division at the Canadian National Championships in Ottawa. Last year, in her first foray into the world of competitive sports aerobics, Ross won the silver medal in the Novice Division. She also competed in a mixed event (a team of three women), winning a bronze medal.

The margin of victory in Ottawa was narrow, only about one point between first and fourth, Ross explains. It wasn't one major flaw that cost her a medal, but probably something minor that a casual observer wouldn't even notice. Failing to smile can cost you one-10th of a point, she notes.

In her individual routine, which lasted one minute, 45 seconds, Ross performed the compulsory 12 exercises from "six element pools." They're designed to show flexibility, kicks, strength, balance and power. As in the past, the "power" exercises, which include jumps and leaps, were her strong point and kept her in medal contention.

A native of Richmond, B.C., a suburb of Vancouver, Ross came to the sport naturally. For nine years, she trained at the Richmond Gymnastics Club, competing at the B.C. Winter Games. At the same time, she studied ballet, jazz, tap dancing and hip hop, performing for one year in a hip hop company known as D Funck.

Tami Ross kicks up her heels

She also remained active in Jewish youth activities, participating in United Synagogue Youth (USY) programs from grades 9 to 12 and later serving as a youth group adviser in a USY Kadimah program. Ross was one of 100 young people who travelled to Poland and Israel on a "pilgrimage seminar."

About two years ago, she attended the Regional Sports Aerobics Competition and watched the athletes go through their paces.

"I thought I could do what they were doing," she says matter-of-factly.

She approached a gymnastics instructor who was serving as a judge at the event, and was pointed in the right direction to get her certification as an aerobics instructor. Afterwards, she took a job at a Richmond sports club where she now teaches step classes, power pacing (spinning) and circuit training.

To get an edge over other aerobics aficionados, Ross makes a weekly two-and-a-half hour trek down the highway to Kirkland, Washington, where she trains with a former aerobics champion. "The same two coaches work with all the athletes in Vancouver and I wanted something different," she says.

Only three or four months after she began taking the sport seriously, she participated in the Canadian Nationals, winning the silver. Following her fourth place finish this year – in a more competitive division – Ross says she's upgrading her goals.

"I'd like to finish in the top three at the next Canadian competition," she says. "In the long run, I'd like to attend a world championship."

In 2000, sport aerobics will be a demonstration sport at the Sydney Olympics. It may become a medal sport by the 2004 Games. And Ross believes there's no reason why she can't be on the Canadian team at one of those events.

הזכות לכבוד והחובה לכבד - גם "ילד של שוקולד"

העיתוי לפרסום ספר הילדים ילד של שוקולד תואם את הנושא המרכזי שנקבע ע"י משרד החינוך לשנתיים הבאות: "הזכות לכבוד והחובה לכבד." באווירה חינוכית זו נשא השתלבות הילד האתיופי בחברת הילדים הישראלית הוא מהותי.

הגננת אינה מחמיצה הזדמנות חינוכית זו ומעדיפה בחוכמתה לא ללכת סחור וסחור ושואלת את דנה: "את חושבת שגיל מלוכלך בגלל שהעור שלו בצבע חום?" וגוצר דיאלוג קצר שבסופו כל הילדים מושיטים ידים ובוחנים את צבע עורם והרי זה פלא, לדנה יש עור בצבע לבן, וגם לטל, לדור צבע קצת חום, לנועה עור חום בהיר ולגיל "יש צבע חום כהה יותר מכולם." אבל מוחה דנה, "הצבע הזה כמו לכלוך!" באמת! דווקא לא כך בעיני דליה; לה מזכיר חום כהה משהו שהיא מאוד, מאוד אוהבת. הילדים מוזמנים למשחק ניחוש מה אוהבת כל-כך הגננת וילד אחד חושב על גוזע עץ, אחר על אדמה, אולי דובי, כלב אהוב אך זה לא זה. דליה רומזת על משהו מתוק, מתוק ובסופו של דבר ובשמחה רבתי ילדי הגן צוהלים: ש-ו-ק-ו-ל-ד!!! שמחה וששון לילדי הגן ודנה... לדנה נהדר שכן כל-כך טוב לשחק עם ילד של שוקולד!

About families

Dear Susan,

I am really upset about the condition of my teenage daughter's room. She never makes her bed and she leaves dirty clothes on the floor. Lately she has also taken to leaving wet towels and food in her room. Can you give me some pointers?

I'm quickly going grey!

Dear Reader,

It sounds as if you are at the end of your rope, held hostage by a tidal wave of clutter. Have courage, this is a common problem with a very real solution.

You need to revisit your rules pertaining to your daughter's room. It is reasonable for you to expect that your daughter will not have food in her room, nor leave wet towels on the floor, and that her dirty laundry should be deposited in a hamper. These three rules will serve to protect her health.

The payoff for your daughter is that you will have no need to enter her room and her privacy remains intact.

A child's room should be their sanctuary. They need to feel it is a place where they can dream, visit privately with friends, or keep a personal journal. These activities are sacred and boundaries ensure one's right to privacy. If boundaries are not respected a whole range of resentment and acting out may occur.

Tell your daughter you respect her need for privacy. In return you ask that she respect your need for a sanitary room. Explain that her neglect in this area can lead to health problems which are not in anyone's best interest. Set up a reward system and try to punctuate the positive before focusing on the negative.

Susan Leventhal is a psychotherapist with 20 years of experience.

What are you laughing at?

A shipwrecked Jew was rescued after many years on a tiny South Pacific island. Resourceful and energetic, he had done much to improve his lot — including building a hut, planting crops, putting in irrigation ditches and a narrow road. At the end of the road were two small buildings.

"Those," he told his rescuers, "are synagogues."

"But why two? You're all alone."

"Yes, but this one is where I pray and the other I wouldn't go into if you paid me."

King Hussein mourned

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Israel went into mourning last Sunday upon hearing official reports that Jordan's King Hussein had died.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered flags to be flown at half-mast for the once former enemy-turned peacemaker. Israel Radio played sombre music throughout the day, a practice usually reserved for national memorial days and the deaths of Israeli leaders. Two large movie screens played footage of Hussein's life in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square.

The general feeling of Hussein's death was one of sorrow and loss. "I don't feel good about his death," said Yossi Mizrachi, a Jerusalemite for more than 30 years. "We love him, we need him. He wasn't just a friend, but a brother. He was a good man with a good heart."

Mizrachi's sentiments were shared by many. "It wasn't a surprise, but it was upsetting," said Tzafrir, an on-duty soldier in the Nahal brigade. "He was a good man, a good king for Israel and Jordan. It hasn't affected me on a day-to-day basis, but in general it is sad."

"He was a good man, and his death upsets me. He was like one of us," Avi Assayag, a Beit Shemesh resident who works as a security guard in Jerusalem, told The CJN. "I hope Abdullah will follow in Hussein's footsteps and that there will be peace."

Although once seen as Israel's enemy, King Hussein lived his last few years as a symbol of Middle East peace. Now people are looking to the new king, King Abdullah II, to carry on this mission.

Hebron resident Samar Muktasib, a father of four, truly wants peace. "I ask for God to help the country so there won't be chaos there, to help Abdullah, to help that there will be peace," Muktasib told The CJN in his glassware store in Jerusalem's Arab shuk. "I'm a Muslim, he's a Muslim. When you hear a Muslim died, you're sad. For me, a Palestinian, a Jerusalemite, a Muslim, I'm

Harris mum on school funding

Hints at support for school health services

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Mike Harris did not even mention the question of financial aid to Jewish schools, despite specific requests by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) regional and national presidents to address the issue.

The premier sat impassively when Ontario region chair Keith Landy and national CJC president Moshe Ronen made their requests and Landy said that young Jews "are mortgaging their future" to pay tuition fees at Jewish schools.

The tax dollars that young Jewish parents pay should follow their children to the school system of their choice, said Landy, in introducing the premier.

However, during a session with Congress' regional leadership prior to the meeting with the regional executive, Harris did agree that students in Jewish and other independent schools should receive the health support services made available to all public school and Roman Catholic school pupils.

"Certain health support services are granted to children with special needs in public and Roman Catholic

ISRAEL

Pledge To Fight Terror

JERUSALEM — Ministers from the Palestinian Authority and seven Arab countries called for an international conference on terrorism. The ministers made their call after a two-day meeting in Jordan, where they pledged to cooperate in the fight against terrorism. The gathering included representatives from Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Sudan, Algeria, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates.

Smokers Can't Sue

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court has ruled that a group of 80 smokers cannot file a class-action suit against a cigarette company. The plaintiffs will instead have to seek damages on a case-by-case basis, the court ruled. The plaintiffs had sought some $243,000 each, charging that the Dubek cigarette company had failed to adequately inform the public of the dangers posed by smoking.

Rape Trial Starts

JERUSALEM — A trial began in Israel of a travel agent accused of raping an Israeli woman two months before she won the Miss World beauty pageant. Shlomo Nour, who is charged with kidnapping and raping Linor Abargil in Milan in October, reportedly faces a maximum jail sentence of 56 years if convicted.

Aid Sent To Columbia

JERUSALEM — Israel dispatched aid to the victims of the recent earthquake in Colombia. The relief includes 1.5 tons of medicine and 3.5 tons of food.

WORLD

Russian Developments

MOSCOW — Moscow's mayor has vowed to crack down on political extremism after Russia's largest ultranationalist group marched in the capital. Yuri Luzhkov, a possible contender for the Russian presidency, also lashed out at his own police force for failing to prevent the march by Russian National Unity, whose members favor black shirts and Nazi-style armbands. Meanwhile, Luzhkov last week ordered that neo-Nazi and anti-Semitic newspapers not be sold in a central Moscow square near the Kremlin.

At the same time, dozens of scholars and university students from across the former Soviet Union and abroad gathered here for a three-day Jewish studies conference.

As well, a centre for Jewish studies was inaugurated last week. The centre is being run jointly by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Moscow State University and the Jewish University of Moscow.

Tax Exemption Sought

WASHINGTON — Two members of the U.S. House of Representatives have introduced legislation to ensure that any settlements paid to Holocaust survivors and their heirs are exempt from federal income taxes. Similar bills have been introduced in several states to exempt settlements from state income taxes.

Lauder New Boss

NEW YORK — Ronald Lauder is the new chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. The cosmetics heir and philanthropist received 41 of the umbrella group's 55 member organizations' votes.

Falwell Apologizes

LYNCHBURG, Tenn. — Rev. Jerry Falwell has apologized for saying last month that the Antichrist is a Jewish man who is probably alive today. "I apologize to my Jewish friends here and around the world," Falwell said, adding that he "should have known better." However, Falwell said he was not apologizing for his beliefs.

Moses Film Banned

KUALA LUMPUR — Malaysian censors have banned the film The Prince of Egypt without explaining their decision. The move against the animated depiction of the life of Moses came five years after Malaysia refused to show the Holocaust epic Schindler's List because filmmaker Steven Spielberg, who also made The Prince of Egypt, refused to make the cuts demanded by the country's censors.

Matzah Do About Matzah Balls

NEW YORK — It wasn't the Olympics, the World Series or even the Maccabiah Games. This was a truly important test of athletic prowess: a matzah ball-eating contest at Ben's restaurant.

"I'm very excited. I'm psyched," said defending champion Bruce Stock, who had a trainer and nutritionist on hand for last Tuesday's second annual event at Ben's, a Manhattan kosher eatery.

The contest did have a serious purpose: to raise funds for the Interfaith Nutrition Network, which operates soup kitchens and homeless shelters in New York City. Streit's Matzos also helped support the contest, which, all told, raised $5,000 for the nutrition network.

When the matzah meal had settled, two contestants had consumed 11⅛ matzah balls each. Defending champ Stock was not one of them. But he vowed to return next year.

In the sudden-death eatoff, Russell Machover, a 41-year-old investment banker, defeated his 19-year-old rival, Corey Barrett. Together, Machover ate more than 16 matzah balls in the two rounds. "My kids can now say I'm a matzah ball-eating champion," he crowed, but added, "My wife makes them better."

Katriuk testimony 'not plausible,' citizenship to be lifted

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The ruling on Jan. 29 by the Federal Court of Canada, that alleged Nazi collaborator Vladimir Katriuk of Montreal came to Canada under false pretenses in August 1951, proves that the Canadian government's efforts to strip suspects of their citizenship and deport them, are working, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) said.

"This was an important case," said CJC national director Jack Silverstone. "It reinforces our view that each case has to be looked at individually."

Silverstone was referring to the fact that the Jewish community was, of late, portrayed as being dismayed by the Canadian government's recent failures to revoke the citizenships of Peteris Vitols and Johann Dueck.

Although Silverstone disagreed with those decisions, there has also "been a fairly reasonable rate of success," he said.

"There is no vast corpus of jurisprudence on this. There is no trend. Each case has to be weighed on its own merits, and I personally believe the government has been going in the right direction.

"The one thing the Jewish community always wanted, is that things be conducted as part of an orderly administration of justice. Each case cannot be seen as a test case," he said.

Katriuk, a 77-year-old retired butcher and beekeeper from Ormstown, was the first Nazi war-crimes case to be tried in Montreal, and the court ruling paved the way for the federal cabinet to strip him of his citizenship, "within weeks," Silverstone said.

Katriuk, however, could challenge subsequent efforts to deport him, a process that could last months.

Katriuk, who once worked for a kosher butcher after moving to Montreal, was "at a loss for words" after the ruling, it was reported in the Gazette. At breaks during his testimony last summer, he would pace back and forth nervously in the courtroom.

Katriuk and his lawyers steadfastly maintained his innocence, his attorneys claiming that his wartime activities were never inquired about when he applied for a visa to Canada, and charging that denaturalization efforts have been an underhanded way to try Canadians for war crimes.

Katriuk has no appeal, accord-

Collins loses human rights case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Retired journalist Doug Collins and a Vancouver-area community newspaper, have been ordered to pay $2,000 and apologize for a series of articles that promoted hatred against Jews.

Collins and the North Shore News were also ordered to refrain from publishing additional articles that attack Jews, and to print a summary of the decision in an upcoming issue of the newspaper.

In a decision released last week, the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal found that four articles that appeared between January and April 1994 "collectively and through repetition of anti-Semitic themes, take on a vicious tone that taps into a centuries-old pattern of persecution and slander of Jews."

Tribunal member Tom Patch found that publication of the columns "is likely to increase the risk to Jewish people of being exposed to hatred or contempt."

Collins, who did not attend the tribunal hearings, called the judgment "a direct threat on freedom of expression." He said he was considering challenging the decision.

In 1997, Collins won a case before a human rights tribunal brought by Canadian Jewish Congress. That case focused on a single North Shore News column, titled Swindler's List, which attacked the Oscar-winning film, Schindler's List.

The tribunal ruled the article, though anti-Semitic, did not "capture the degree of calumny, detestation or vilification signified by 'hatred or contempt' as the phrase is used" in the B.C. Human Rights Code.

A second complaint against Collins was launched by Victoria businessman Harry Abrams, who alleged that four of Collins' articles, taken together, promoted contempt of Jews. The columns, which included Swindler's List, focused on

A genuine friend passes on

In the photo in this column we see throngs of Israelis and Jordanians traversing the then newly opened Sheikh Hussein Bridge near Beit Gavriel on Lake Kinneret.

The date was Nov. 10, 1994.

Yitzhak Rabin, who was then prime minister, and King Hussein met in Israel to exchange the peace treaty documents they had signed one month earlier.

It was the first public visit by King Hussein to Israel and, as the news reports recorded that day, "he was given a rapturous reception both by Israeli political leaders and by hordes of cheering and flag-waving schoolchildren."

But of course, it was not the first time the king had actually visited Israel. He had already met secretly with Israeli officials a number of times. One of the most compelling of those visits was on the eve of the Yom Kippur War. "The little king," as he was affectionately known in Israel, had come to the Jewish state urging its leaders to effect some movement in the multilateral political arena to pre-empt an impending explosion in the military arena.

For various reasons, that explosion was not pre-empted. War once again descended on the region in its full brutal force.

The King sent a brigade of his army into Syria, but he did not attack Israel, thus sparing Israeli forces from having having to fight on a third front. Israeli leaders understood the significance of the King's decision.

So too did the Israeli people.

The King was universally liked and respected by the people of Israel.

He was genuine. And the people of Israel knew it instinctively, after five decades of bitter experience measuring the gap between what their neighbors said and what they did.

On that sunny day 4½ years ago, Nov. 10, 1994, King Hussein told the world: "The Israeli and Jordanian people are on the threshold of a peace which I hope generations to come will cherish, protect and enjoy."

He meant every word.

Knowing this to be true, Israelis received him "rapturously" and "hordes of schoolchildren" cheered him and waved their flags.

Rabin responded to the king that day with the following words: "I believe this is the most beautiful thing, the most beautiful act, to end not just the state of war, but to establish the structure of peace, to build the relations of peace."

Now, 4½ years after that sunny November day, both signatories to the peace treaty are gone. Indeed Rabin was murdered almost exactly one year to the day after the photo of the congested, but obviously delighted, human traffic on Sheikh Hussein Bridge.

It is for this reason, the accompanying photo is so precious.

It depicts so plainly but ever so poignantly the "structure of peace" being put into place: ordinary people, and of course, not so ordinary people, simply walking across the metal expanse connecting the two countries, into their neighbor's land, people simply meeting other people.

It was both a deeply symbolic and a deeply substantive act in the slow, incremental nurturing of peace between two neighboring peoples that the late King Hussein sought to his very last moment on earth to help bring about.

And in all its plain and simple ordinariness, the scene of people walking on the bridge, was indeed a "most beautiful thing."The people of Israel and Jews around the world bid a respectful farewell to a genuine friend.

'Shidduch' brings together Conservative synagogue districts

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leaders of the newly formed Canadian region of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism look forward to better serving member congregations as a result of the recent merger of the organization's Ontario region and Eastern Canada region.

Among the plans they intend to implement is a first-ever Canadian conference to address issues such as membership retention, synagogue attendance and religious observance, said regional president Gabe Grushcow of Toronto.

Other anticipated regional events include celebrations of the merger in Toronto and possibly Montreal, as well as a contest to come up with a more appropriate name for the region. (Although the Canadian region serves congregations in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes, Canadian congregations west of Ontario tend to affiliate with geographically closer American regions.)

Celebration plans are not yet firmed up, but "we're calling it a simchah," said Chuck Dixter, senior vice-president of the Canadian region.

"We've been calling this a shidduch," he explained, adding that United Synagogue's central office in New York, which initiated the merger, is known as "the in-laws."

Still in the early planning stages is a program that will match university students from out of town with surrogate families at universities across the region, said Dixter.

The new region retains its former offices in Toronto and Montreal. It is headquartered on Steeles Avenue West in Concord, Ont., and serves 22 congregations – eight in the Greater Toronto Area, five in Montreal, two in Ottawa, and one each in Hamilton, London, North Bay, Sarnia, St. Catharines, Halifax and Saint John – representing an estimated 100,000 people.

Gabe Grushcow

Last July, Shirley Gossack, former part-time executive director of the Ontario region, became full-time executive director and youth director for the two regions. She continues in the same capacity for the Canadian region.

Chuck Dixter

The former regions are now districts of the Canadian region. Grushcow, a retired engineer, is president of the Ontario district, and Dixter, a Montreal dentist, is president of the Eastern Canada district – in addition to their regional positions.

The merger allows the two districts to "have a better infrastructure for both and to be able to provide services and programming to more people on a more thorough basis," said Dixter in a telephone interview.

"We're trying to develop a Canadian point of view," said Grushcow. Canadian Jews tend to be more traditional than their American counterparts, he noted.

In addition, the merger will allow Canadian Conservative Jewry to have a stronger voice on issues such as pluralism in Israel, he said. A case in point is a recent letter-writing campaign to protest the first of three Knesset votes aimed at bypassing Israel's Supreme Court decision requiring the government to appoint Conservative and Reform representatives to municipal religious councils.

The United Synagogue merger was preceded last year by a parallel merger of United Synagogue Youth, the Conservative movement's program for high school-age students, which led to more exchange programs and "much improved" youth programming, said Dixter.

The umbrella organization, founded in 1913, represents some 750 synagogues in the United States, Canada, Mexico and Israel.

Kolel revives Tu b'Shvat seder

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As kids, we celebrated Tu b'Shvat, the new year of the trees, by buying trees in Israel and feasting on dried fruit and (usually) dried up boxer (carob).

This year, an old tradition was renewed by Kolel: a centre for Liberal Jewish learning: the Tu b'Shvat seder.

Over 60 people took part in the event, which was led by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, and Rabbi Jeremy Schwartz, assistant director. Long tables held trays of fruit, nuts and cookies; green paper leaves hung from the ceiling; and a corner pillar was decorated to look like a tree.

Rabbi Goldstein explained that the Tu b'Shvat seder is "a great kabbalistic tradition that has fallen by the wayside.

"It's all about going into the symbolic level of nature, Torah or life itself," she said.

It is not surprising that the Mishnah, which describes many new years, also lists one for trees, she said. "It made so much sense when we lived on the land. We depended on trees for everything – for shelter, for food, for warmth."

Now, people tend to take nature for granted, said Rabbi Goldstein, adding that we must learn to "re-appreciate it, to be a shepherd and care for the environment."

The seder was modelled after the Pesach seder, with the four cups of wine, the symbolic use of foods, even the concluding prayer L'Shanah Haba'ah b'Yerushalayim, Next year in Jerusalem.

The four seasons were symbolized by different colors of wine, particular foods, and unique insights.

Rabbi Goldstein said that in winter, the body shuts down. "We eat too much, stay home, watch too much TV, become couch latkes."

This section of the seder reminds us that we have to force ourselves to care for our bodies, she said.

It is important to realize that one does not connect with God only by mystical means, she said.

She urged the participants to eat almonds slowly. "Really taste them, and realize that both the food and the taste are from God."

Spring is the world of the heart, the world of emotion. "In spring, we thaw emotionally and physically. We are more open to each other, to relationships."

The rabbis say that this is the time we should begin thinking about tshuvah, repentance, in preparation for Rosh Hashanah, Rabbi Goldstein said.

Spring is also a time for lovers, she said, not just romantic love, but also love for one's children, love for a cause, love for God.

Just as winter recognizes the world of the body, so summer recognizes the mind. "Just as in winter, we ignore the needs of the body, in summer we have to be forced to challenge the mind and to grow intellectually," she said.

Raisins, the fruit for summer, is soft all over. The handout for the seder explained that this is like Israel, where no part is wasted, and the Torah, whose every part is sweet.

The wine was half white and half red, warning us to temper the mind with the heart, intellect with emotion.

Autumn is a coming together, the rabbi explained, a "transcendence of mind, body, and heart. We are at one with other people, with our self."

This unity also allows us to prepare for the messianic world, the world of redemption, she said.

During each section of the service, rabbis Goldstein and Schwartz said the blessings over wine or fruit, led the singing of an appropriate song and encouraged discussions between those at the same table.

As is traditional on Tu b'Shvat, a new fruit was served, so that the participants could recite the Shehechianu blessing.

Rabbi Goldstein urged that people pray not just for physical peace in Jerusalem, but for ecological peace as well.

The next day featured seminars on ecology.

Visit to Kiev rekindles old memories, friendships

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In June 1973, Igor Korenzvit left his native Kiev with his sister and their widowed mother. Friends warned the young man he would be sorry, but Korenzvit's confidence in his decision was unshakable.

"I was born a capitalist, I guess," he jokes now.

On December 11, 1973, the family arrived in Toronto. Korenzvit, then a 27-year-old engineer, had $8.25 to his name, and knew only a dozen or so English words, but he was determined to make a go of it.

Fourteen years ago, he established what is now a successful upscale office furniture business, IKOR Integrated Facilities Inc.

In the past decade, he has become involved in a number of Jewish organizations and serves on the boards of about half a dozen.

Until last year, Korenzvit never seriously considered returning to Ukraine. In December, however – shortly after celebrating the 25th anniversary of his arrival in Canada – he and Bonnie, his Toronto-born wife of 23 years, went to Kiev as part of a Canadian Jewish delegation on its way to Israel for the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations.

The whirlwind 36-hour trip included a poignant reunion with three childhood friends with whom Korenzvit had been close from age 6 until he emigrated.

All four had had much potential – Korenzvit had a good position as an engineer; one friend was a doctor; another an academic (one step above a professor); and the third, an architect.

When the four reunited, Korenzvit was dismayed to learn that – although they were fairly well dressed – none of his friends could afford a car. The doctor, a heart specialist, brings home $120 a month after expenses, he said.

"I knew the situation was bad in Russia, but they were bright and their families were doing well," said Korenzvit.

He answered their questions about life in Toronto with mixed emotions, not wanting to show off or disparage his friends, but also feeling it was his obligation to tell them the truth.

He tried very hard to persuade them to leave the country, he said, sifting through his Kiev photos in an IKOR meeting room. But at age 52 (in a country where life expectancy for males is considerably lower than it is here), the three friends felt they were too old to leave. They were still hopeful that their sons might have a brighter future without having to emigrate, they said.

"It was hard for me to judge if they were rationalizing," said Korenzvit.

He also tried to convince people to leave the country, when the delegation visited Jewish organizations run under the auspices of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Among other services, the organizations help the elderly, and offer Hebrew classes and assistance to prospective olim.

Korenzvit didn't accept the arguments of staffers that people have to decide for themselves about emigrating.

"They can't, because they don't have enough information," he insisted. Canadians, he pointed out, are better informed than local Jews about anti-Semitism in the former Soviet Union.

Kiev's Jewish population has dwindled from 350,000 when Korenzvit lived there to under 100,000.

Twenty-five years later, Korenzvit's perspective on Jewish Kiev had also changed.

Growing up, he knew he was Jewish, but even his parents had no formal Jewish education, having been raised under the Soviet regime. "My parents would go to someone's basement with the windows covered to bake matzah, but we kept it in the basket with the bread. We didn't know you couldn't eat bread [on Passover]."

Nor did they know the details of the 1941 mass killing at Babi Yar on the outskirts of the city. Korenzvit's participation in a memorial service there, reading an English poem and joining other group members in placing red roses on the fresh snow covering the mass graves, was "very, very touching."

A new revelation for Korenzvit was that the puppet theatre he knew as a child was once a synagogue. The "very beautiful" 94-year-old building has since been sold back to the Jewish community by the government. It is in poor shape, but money for repairs, let alone maintenance, is scarce.

They also visited the synagogue Korenzvit remembers from his one childhood visit. "We were afraid to go there," he recalled.

The nursery where he took his little sister, atop his shoulders, now houses a Jewish organization that was on the group itinerary. Around the corner was the run-down apartment where he used to live. The kitchen fan he installed 27 years ago is still visible from outside.

It was his first time back to Kiev in 25 years. Igor Korenzvit, below, stands at the doorway to the apartment in which he grew up. At right, he visits the synagogue of his youth. "We were afraid to go there," he recalled.
[The photo of the synagogue has been altered to eliminate the reference in the priestly blessing of the Hebrew spelling for God's name.]

In retrospect, Korenzvit is glad he decided to go. He took every opportunity to supplement the remarks of the local guide and feels he helped other group members get a complete picture.

But he was much happier when it came time to leave for Israel. "I have to tell you, it was like I couldn't wait to leave," he said, his tone of voice leaving no doubt that he meant each word.

A rare man

Many special images come to mind as we remember King Hussein ibn Talal of Jordan. There is the most recent image of the frail, obviously ill man who left his hospital bed in Minnesota in late October to travel to Wye Plantation in Maryland to help ensure an agreement between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat.

Or we can recall the image of the monarch wearing his ancestral, red-checked, Bedouin kaffiyeh standing on Har Herzl in Jerusalem alongside the blue and white flag-draped coffin of Yitzhak Rabin, eulogizing the Jewish man he called "brother."

Perhaps the most poignant of the many poignant images, however, was that of the sovereign ruler of Jordan kneeling in sorrow before each of the grieving families of the eight Israeli school girls killed by a Jordanian soldier at Naharayim two years ago.

He was indeed a rare man and a rare leader. After Anwar al-Sadat, he was the only one among all of the Arab heads of state in the region who demonstrated peace as much as spoke about it, who set an example of peace to his own people, and finally, who signed a treaty of peace with the Jewish state.

He was, of course, not a perfect man, nor a perfect ruler, nor always a perfect friend, but he was sincere and courageous and, as most Israelis will agree, he became a much admired, trusted, honored ally.

The countries of the west, including Canada, must quickly act to help ensure the economic stability of the nation that he passes on to his son Abdullah. For there are many cruel and callow villains lurking in the high weeds of the harsh Middle East who will soon test the strength and the mettle of young king.

King Hussein is dead. May God rest his soul.

A good deal

Not to be overlooked in the drama of last weekend's events was the signing of the social union accord last Thursday by the federal government, nine provinces and two territories. The leaders of the country who sat around the table are to be commended. They struck a good deal.

Political and governmental experts will still be debating the substantive merits of the agreement well into the next millennium. But the key achievement was in the very fact that an agreement was signed at all, for it meant that compromise and cooperation carried the day, that principle found its reasonable balance with pragmatics, and that common national interest was given higher priority than discrete provincial interest.

The federal government retains the right to act in the social sphere but has promised not to do so unilaterally. The provinces will receive substantially enhanced financial abilities to directly provide health, education and social programming for their residents.

And a mechanism will be established to resolve the disputes that will inevitably arise between the two levels of government.

Predictably, Quebec did not join the consensus, despite the many alternative proposals for doing so suggested by other provinces. The people of Quebec, however, will not be deprived of their share of the new funding that will flow to the provinces over the next three years.

It does appear, however, that they have been deprived the opportunity to join formally in a new, evolving, cooperative federalism – a federalism that acknowledges the need, enshrines the legitimacy and devises appropriate ways for both levels of government to operate in the social field for the benefit of everyone in Canada.

Claims researchers on PA books not credited

Re: PA "preparing children for war" (CJN, Jan. 28). David Bedein did not research the PA school books. The research was conducted by a different organization called the Centre for the Monitoring of Peace. The full report on PA books is available at the centre's Web site – http://www.edume.org. Bedein was misleading you by claiming this material as his own.

These are the facts: The research was initiated by Andre Marcus of Monaco, who also funded the project. Marcus realized that no other research of this kind had ever been conducted, and wanted to see if peace was in fact being taught as a result of the Oslo accords. The research was carried out by Itamar Marcus, director of research for the project, together with Prof. Yochanan Manor and myself, and a large staff of translators who reviewed and analyzed 140 PA school books over a period of a year.

Objects to columnist Gerber's views on Orthodoxy

Jean Gerber in past columns and particularly in her column of Jan. 28 seems to relish the very same "gut-wrenching slanging" that she herself condemns in others. Words like "ugly…disgusting…[and] zealotry" have no place in a discussion of the religious divisions among Jews today.

Furthermore, to describe other Jews as having the motivations of "crass" politics and money "wringing" is unwarranted and irrelevant to the issues, imputing expedient and base intentions to your opponents. It is the empty rhetorical gimmick of one who herself is not truly interested in "honest dialogue."

I am sure that many would like to challenge her false accusations and portrayals of the Orthodox position, her questionable interpretations of Jewish history and her faulty criticisms of the analogy between the rules of religion and sport.

Montrealers schlepped equipment to Israel

On Jan. 12, the Israeli under-17 junior hockey team played a game against Bialik High School. The game was truly spectacular, not because of the level of play, but because of who the participants were. The fact that a group of Israelis played a game in a sport that was unknown in that country prior to 1990, is remarkable to say the least.

If one were to ask how these kids got to the Samuel Moskovitch Arena, the correct answer is not because some New York philanthropist brought them to Montreal, nor is it because Bialik High School invited them. The Israelis are able to ice this team because of the efforts of a group of Montrealers who have been schlepping equipment to the Metulla ice rink in Israel for over seven years now.

The Canadian Friends of Israeli Winter Sports, formerly, the Canadian Friends of the Israeli Ice Hockey Association, guided by the efforts of David Lisbona and Larry Markowitz, has sent over 800 pounds of equipment to Israel since 1991. Every native Israeli who skated last night owes his success in the sport, in part, to this organization.

The true mark of success of the Israeli Ice Hockey Association cannot be measured in goals and points, but rather in the fact that it even exists at all. In not acknowledging those people who have truly made it all possible, the organizers unfortunately missed the boat, or should we say the net.

Society missing the boat on value of seniors

My work as a social worker at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has enabled me to see and to understand that we sometimes miss out on the wealth of experience that our seniors have accumulated in their lives.

At the end of World War II, after escaping tyranny, Holocaust survivors had to return to living life. These very same heroes started new jobs, learned new languages, married/remarried and started families. They began to live as we do, with dignity, with spirit, with the desire to go on. Their blueprint for life continued to be survival.

There is not much room for elderly heroes in our frenetic culture. The shame of it is that all generations lose when the young and the busy, don't have the time to listen to our living history. Their stories, the distillation of their lives, deserve our recognition and perpetuation.

Opinions

The Itzik Mordechai factor

One hundred days before the Israeli election, the fog is beginning to lift. It now appears that the three serious contenders for the position of prime minister will be the incumbent, Benjamin Netanyahu, Opposition leader Ehud Barak, and former defence minister Itzik Mordechai.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Mordechai, who is not well known to North American audiences, recently joined the new, centre party after being summarily fired by Netanyahu. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, Dan Meridor and Roni Milo all agreed to give him the top slot on their list.

While Mordechai's defection from Likud does not carry the same ideological weight as Meridor's earlier departure, it is another concrete indication of the crisis of confidence within the Netanyahu cabinet. Mordechai is relatively new to politics.

The son of Kurdish immigrants who came to Israel from Iraq in 1951, he had a successful military career, and reached the rank of general, responsible for the Central Command. In 1996, when he decided to run for office, Mordechai held lengthy talks with Labor, his first political choice. When Shimon Peres refused to promise him the position of defence minister, Mordechai turned to Likud, where he extracted the same promise from Netanyahu.

For Netanyahu, Mordechai's appeal to centrist, security-minded voters, combined with his Mizrachi (Middle Eastern) origins, were an important plank in his election campaign. Indeed, many observers argued that Mordechai "gave" Netanyahu the centrist voters, who were crucial to his success.

Throughout the tenure of the Netanyahu government, Mordechai has been pegged as one of the "dovish" ministers, firmly committed to the Oslo process. He has been courted by the Americans, and is viewed as a critical factor in the success of the Wye talks last October.

Others criticize him as indecisive, and as motivated more than anything by his personal need to maintain a senior position on the Netanyahu team. Netanyahu has perceived Mordechai as a threat and, therefore, as a rival to be managed.

In fact, it was Netanyahu's refusal, this time around, to guarantee Mordechai the defence post in the next Likud government that finally pushed Mordechai to leave the ranks. (Netanyahu calculated that even if he won, the next government would likely be a unity government, in which the defence slot would go to Barak or Shahak, then the lead man in the centre party).

When Mordechai met with Shahak, Meridor and Milo to explore the potential for himself in the centre party, he presented them with both an opportunity and a threat. By then, the "big bang" of the centre party had been reduced to a faint whimper.

Shahak was dropping in the polls, and he and Meridor had not yet agreed on the leadership of their list. Mordechai's obvious ability to draw voters from the right made him irresistible to the threesome at the helm of the fledgling party.

Shahak was relieved of the need to face the reality of his own dropping popularity. Meridor, on the other hand, was forced to concede the chance to fight for the top slot himself. His image as an "almost No.1" is now likely to stick forever.

As for Milo and Mordechai, only time will tell if their differences can actually be bridged. Milo (also formerly with Likud) embarked upon this new political venture on a single-issue platform – the fight against religious coercion.

He succeeded in raising significant funds abroad by appealing to members of Reform and Conservative congregations, who have been angered by the proposed conversion law and other measures taken by the Orthodox parties and the rabbinate.

Mordechai, in turn, describes himself as traditional, and professes a close relationship with the leadership of the powerful ultra-Orthodox party, Shas.

The inherent conflict in the new Milo-Mordechai alliance was demonstrated in the last week of January, during the Knesset vote on a new bill dealing with religious councils.

Earlier, the Supreme Court had ruled that Reform and Conservative representatives must be allowed to serve on the councils (which deal with all aspects of religious services provided by the state). In response, a bill was tabled in the Knesset, requiring all members of the religious council to accept the authority of the Orthodox rabbinate.

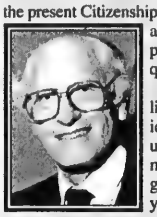
Mordechai's "yes" vote broke the deadlock, but illustrated the difficulty he and Milo will face in drafting a coherent platform to take to their voters.

In Israel, perhaps more than anywhere else, politics make strange bedfellows. In the course of the next 100 days, several new permutations could emerge. Barak may yet try to convince Mordechai to join the broad Labor umbrella, entitled "One Israel."

If Mordechai insists on running alone, the key question will be to whom he will throw his support in the almost-certain second round. Even if the new party does not survive into the future, its ultimate significance may be its role in toppling Netanyahu.

Canadian citizenship redefined

On Dec. 7, the federal government tabled Bill 63, a new law on Canadian citizenship that would replace the present Citizenship Act. I both welcome and regret some of the proposed changes, and question some others.



Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Some critics believe that the new residency requirement is unduly onerous. Formerly, a new immigrant had to wait five years before he or she could become a citizen. That has not changed, but the government proposes to reduce the provision that the applicant must have spent at least three of the five years in the country. This is a reduction from the former four-year stipulation and is to be welcomed. But in my opinion, it is still onerous for people whose business requires repeated absences from Canada or whose health may suggest that a warmer clime during the winter would be beneficial or even necessary. Requiring three years' physical presence out of the five-year obligation span is more than is required by many other countries. Australia and the United States require only two years.

This rule also does not take into consideration the fact that the applicant may already have resided in Canada for many years.

The language requirement is also increased: The applicant must now show a knowledge of either French or English. That looks OK at first sight, but the knowledge of one of our national languages must be sufficient to pass oral and written exams. If that rule had been in existence years ago, many of our grandparents would not have passed, for being able to speak a language is one thing; commanding it sufficiently for an exam is another.

Citizenship judges (who are appointed without necessarily being lawyers) will no longer have the responsibility for making decisions on individual applications. These will be made by bureaucrats in an administrative rather than a judicial process, which rules out the normal course of appeals. From now on, the minister can annul citizenship of people who are believed to have obtained it by using a false identity or who have been judged ineligible for other reasons. Though the minister may be in error, there will be no court to review his or her actions.

Up to now, a child born to Canadian citizens has automatically become a citizen – but no longer. Citizenship can be passed on only for two generations to descendants born outside of Canada. Fortunately, this provision has one exemption: If the person thus deprived of the opportunity of being a citizen risks statelessness, the opportunity to become a citizen remains. But even so, there is a worrisome flaw: The bill introduces a distinction between children of naturalized and of native-born citizens. It is a distinction of dubious worth.

The proposed changes are not radical, but I always question an arrangement that provides for bureaucrats to make decisions against which there is no appeal. It may shorten proceedings, but it will not make them necessarily fairer or more humane.

On the whole, the new law would uphold a basic principle: that Canadian citizenship is a privilege, and privilege never comes without obligations.

Sticks ... stones ... and words

Words can kill. Perhaps not directly, but certainly indirectly. Every recent case of genocide, from the Holocaust to Rwanda to Bosnia to Kosovo, has been accompanied by a torrent of words, which we now term as "hate speech." Sometimes these words do not lead to action. But at times they do, or at least they seem to reinforce and exacerbate existing hatreds, with horrific results.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

For this reason, all liberal democracies with the exception of the United States have laws in place which restrict speech that promotes hatred against identifiable groups. But these laws are not and should not be aimed at speech which some group may find offensive. A higher standard is required, and for good reason. Too often we can be offended by speech with which we disagree. Critical speech, argumentative speech, offensive speech – these are not hate speech.

What is ironic is that the United States, the lone liberal democracy with a nearly absolute standard of free speech, is nevertheless prone to fits of political correctness that are as ludicrous as any that might be caused by a misapplication of hate speech laws. Indeed, my sense is that speech is at least as free in Canada, with its hate speech laws at federal and provincial levels, as it is in the United States. We are not waging "culture wars" on the American scale.

A recent American case is tragicomic. A white aide to the black mayor of Washington D.C. has had to submit his resignation. In a private conversation with two other officials, one of whom was black, the white aide said, "I will have to be niggardly with this fund because it's not going to be a lot of money." The black official stormed out, the incident became public, and the aide – who happens to be gay – is looking for a new job.

The problem here is that the word "niggardly" is not a racial slur. The word is Scandinavian in origin, apparently dating back to a 14th-century Scandinavian word meaning miser. But to lexical hard-liners, that may still not be benign. The past president of the National Bar Association wondered: "Do we really know where the Norwegians got the word?"

As of this writing I do not know what the last word will be in this case. Perhaps the backlash will force the mayor to rehire his aide, who had never had the slightest blemish of racism or prejudice on his record. The gay community is not pleased, and even leaders in the black community are divided, with some embarrassed at this obvious overreaction.

There have been previous cases where misspoken slurs have taken a toll. Recall the fallout from Jesse Jackson's use of the term "Hymietown" for New York. The difference here is that this was no misunderstanding, but a deliberate slur. Still Jackson was quickly rehabilitated.

In similar fashion, Pat Buchanan directed slurs against American Jews, and while taken to task, he was also rehabilitated in short order. Both Jackson and Buchanan now host U.S. TV talk shows.

Language conditions our thoughts in subtle ways. I once read how militant feminists rejected use of the word "seminal" as in the phrase "a seminal idea," arguing it reinforced male domination. Why not use "ovular" instead? The first reaction of many is to laugh. But in fact, it is precisely through such subconscious manipulations that language reinforces stereotypes.

English is full of uses of words like "black" or "dark" to denote evil, danger or harm. On the other hand, "white" is often associated with purity. Brides wear virginal white; we say "pure as snow;" and in older westerns, invariably the outlaw was dressed in black, while the Lone Ranger was dressed in white. Even his horse was white. And the use of masculine pronouns also has demeaned the status of women. While I don't use the word "herstory," I will try to mix "him and her" when referring to non-specific nouns (e.g. every medical researcher should value her independence).

So there is no harm in being aware of the subliminal effects of language and trying to cut down on the use of words that can promote inequality or reinforce negative stereotypes. But this sensitivity should not make us so thinskinned that our conversation and debate become emasculated – oops. Indeed, the purveyors of hate speech want nothing more than to obfuscate the distinctions between their explicit, harmful messages and the more benign phrases to which some people might take offence.

The Kirshner File

Tulchinsky plows furrows of Canadian Jewish history

Montreal's late 19th-century garment industry opened Gerald Tulchinsky's eyes to the riches of a relatively unfurrowed but fascinating field – Canadian Jewish history.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Twenty years ago, Tulchinsky, a Queen's University historian, specialized in urban and economic issues. He was an authority on the Canadian business elite and the timber trade in the Ottawa Valley. His first book was The River Barons: Montreal Businessmen and the Growth of Industry and Transportation, 1837-53.

But after contributing a number of essays on the mercantile class to the Dictionary of Canadian Biography, Tulchinsky realized that he had found his true calling.

While gathering material for these articles, he discovered that Jews, both as owners and workers, had played a crucial role in an industry which catered to an emerging mass market in Canada, the so-called rag trade.

"It was my launching pad into Canadian Jewish history," explained Tulchinsky, the son of a Ukrainian immigrant storekeeper who settled in Canada in 1924. "I began from a business perspective, but as I delved deeper into the rthythm, language and culture of Montreal Jewry, I developed a broader interest in Canadian Jewry."

After producing a series of monographs on Jews for such periodicals as Canadian Ethnic Studies and Journal of Canadian Studies, Tulchinsky wrote Taking Root: The Origins of the Canadian Jewish Community. The book, published in 1992 to critical acclaim, spanned the period from 1760 to 1920.

Late last year, the sequel appeared. Branching Out: The Transformation of the Canadian Jewish Community (Stoddart) brings the story right up to date. Tulchinsky describes it as an overview rather than an encyclopedia because each chapter has the makings of a book.

Hewing closely to its title, he concludes: "Canada's Jews...have entered the Canadian mainstream to a degree undreamed of in 1921... and (today) constitute a much different community..."

Tulchinsky, 65, claims that Canadian Jewish historiography is still in its formative stages, but is showing some of the sophistication that characterizes works on Jews in the United States and Britain.

"They're a generation or so ahead of us there," he said, referring to American and British historians like Henry Feingold, Naomi Cohen, Cecil Roth and Basil Williams. "In Canada, we're getting started."

Tulchinsky claims that two distinguished pioneers – Louis Rosenberg (Canada's Jews: A Social and Economic Study of the Jews in Canada, 1939) and Benjamin Sack (History of the Jews in Canada, 1948) – laid the groundwork for Jewish historiography in this country.

But since they lacked the resources, time and research funds, their books were neither comprehensive or definitive.

In his view, the field has grown significantly in the past two decades, having attracted writers of the calibre of Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg (The Jewish Community in Canada), Erna Paris (Jews: An Account of Their Experience in Canada) and Irving Abella (A Coat of Many Colors).

Tulchinsky believes that the Canadian Jewish Historical Society, of which he is a member, has helped foster interest by encouraging and publishing research in its journal, Canadian Jewish Studies. "It provides a forum for young and upcoming scholars," he said.

Scoffing at the hackneyed notion that Canadian history is intrinsically monotonous, Tulchinsky thinks it is every bit as dramatic and exciting as, say, American history. "It may be presented in schools in a boring fashion, but I don't blame the teachers. It's the fault of the people who design the curriculum."

A graduate of the University of Toronto and McGill, Tulchinsky is currently working on two books. The first explores the Canadian clothing industry from 1850 to 1980. The second, with co-author Adam Fuerstenberg, a retired academic from Toronto, is a biography of J.D. Salsberg, the left-wing politician, labor unionist, Yiddishist and Canadian Jewish News columnist who died in 1998.

"You can't understand the social, economic and political life of Jews in Canada in the 20th century without looking closely at the experiences of thousands of Jewish men and women who, at one point in their lives, labored in garment factories and belonged to unions," he said by way of explaining his fascination with this subject.

According to Tulchinsky, Salsberg was clearly a man for all seasons. "He was a beloved and revered figure, a defender of the Jewish people." The biography, he said, will be based on Salsberg's papers and interview tapes.

Further in the future,Tulchinsky plans to crank out profiles of influential Canadian rabbis. In his pantheon will be, among others, Nathan Gordon and Harry Stern of Montreal, and Maurice Eisendrath and Abraham Feinberg of Toronto. "They're among the most interesting and important figures in Canadian Jewish life in the early 20th century."

Born and raised in Brantford, Ont., Tulchinsky, the father of three children, proffers the unorthodox belief that the current preoccupation with Holocaust memorials, the pursuit of alleged war criminals, the excessive concern over anti-Semitism and the mounting worries about mixed marriages offer little support for future growth in the Canadian Jewish community.

In fact, he warns, they may be "dangerous and irrelevant distractions." What, he asks, do these topics tell the younger generation about today and the future?

Jewish schools, however, do "offer hope and can activate the real possibility that Jewish culture, in its many forms, will continue."

The beauty of Branching Out: The Transformation of the Canadian Jewish Community is that you can sample and nibble on its wares in separate sittings.

Tulchinsky appears to miss nothing of importance - from population shifts and federal immigration policy to anti-Semitism and the spectre of Quebec separatism.

His discussion of farm colonies out West is instructive. Due to the fact that such farms were seriously undercapitalized, the number of Jewish farmers fell drastically in the 1930s. Nowadays they are an endangered species.

Gerald Tulchinsky

He discusses the explosive Jewish school question in Quebec, which exposed the veins of intolerance in that province. And his survey of the garment industry, which employed three-quarters of Montreal's gainfully employed Jews in 1931, is enlightening.

Tulchinsky's epilogue, in which he analyzes the differences between the community in 1920 and today, is revealing.

There are now an estimated 360,000 Jews, up from 121,000 in 1921, and the vast majority are Canadian-born. Immigrants come from far-flung lands, not just eastern Europe. Toronto, rather than Montreal, is at the centre of the Jewish universe in Canada. And Winnipeg has given way to Vancouver. Meanwhile, small-town communities are heading toward oblivion.

As a collectivity, Jews are far better off than their grandparents, with the highest average incomes, the best levels of education and the highest rates of participation in the professions.

Serious anti-Semitism has almost disappeared, and Canadian Jewry has become an assertive, well-off, confident group.

What a difference a few generations make.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI DANIEL KOMITO GOTTLIEB

The meaning of camp

Having celebrated Tu b'Shvat, and in the process having looked beyond the snow and imagined the warmth of spring and the blossoming of the almond trees, I have continued my acceleration of the seasons.

At this moment, I am enjoying an imaginary summer. The sun is shining. Each morning I watch it come up over the lake, its brilliance scattered across the surface of the water.

I am at a Jewish summer camp. And there is no place I'd rather be.

For the past 28 years, I have spent all or part of every summer at one of the Jewish educational summer camps of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the Reform movement with which my congregation is affiliated.

And this year, for the first time, I will be able to spend such a summer here in Ontario, at the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism's (CCRJ) Camp for Living Judaism, near Parry Sound.

There are several reasons why you should send your children to join me, or to attend any one of the Jewish educational summer camps run by our community's religious and/or Zionist movements.

If your children are below the age of bar/bat mitzvah, a Jewish educational summer camp will reinforce their Jewish learning and strengthen their Jewish identity.

The camp will provide a communal setting in which to live the Judaism that has been learned in the classroom, and role models for Jewish life and leadership.

And after bar/bat mitzvah, the key to Jewish life is meaning, and when you are a teenager, meaning is directly related to friends. One of the keys to developing a circle of Jewish friends is Jewish camping.

My friend Joel Lurie Grishaver, a Jewish educator whom I met at a Jewish camp, once wrote, "The over-simple concept is this: Kids date people they hang out with. Therefore, to increase the odds that your kids will date Jews, and therefore more probably marry a Jew, you want them to hang out with other Jewish kids.

"When they were little you could arrange play dates and influence their friendship patterns. Now, the more you push, the less likely you are to achieve results. The more you criticize their friends (and their dates), the more likely it is that you will be completely ignored.

"So the over-simple logic is this: If you can manage to get them to spend a whole or part of a summer at a Jewish camp, you have the greatest single chance at allowing them to make friends on their own."

Now let's be less simple. Jewish friends are not anywhere near enough. Jewish friends won't keep your children from interdating. (Just look at the statistics.)

To increase the odds, your children need Jewish friends with whom they do Jewish things. Therefore a camp full of Jews is not the same as a Jewish camp. You want a setting in which Judaism is made meaningful and important (but still very playful and a lot of fun).

When that happens, there are positive social and intellectual forces pulling your child to date someone with whom they can share those experiences.

So if this summer's plans are still up in the air, send your child to a Jewish educational camp. That's where my children will be. And me. And my wife. (We met at a Jewish camp...)

Ideas through the ages

The Seekers, The Story of Man's Continuing Quest to Understand His World*, by Daniel J. Boorstin (Random House, $34.95).

Daniel Boorstin is a polymath – he knows many things and is able to write about them in a popular and engaging manner. For 12 years he served as the librarian of Congress and was also director of the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Seekers is the third and final volume in a monumental trilogy. The previous two books, The Discoverers and The Creators, were highly praised for their grand style, fertile imagination and clear and authoritative presentation of a mass of material.

This book, about half the length of the others and less detailed, presents the thoughts of about 50 individuals from the time of Socrates to our own age.

The author divides the history into three sections: antiquity's foundations in the biblical, classical and medieval traditions; the evolution of political science from Thucydides and Machiavelli to Rousseau; and modern thinkers' quests for truth, whether Emerson's transcendentalism, William James' pragmatism, or Bergson's élan vital.

The text is studded with deftly drawn portraits of the groundbreaking "seekers," replete with anecdotes about them along with evaluations by the author of their importance in intellectual history.

In discussing the idea of the Covenant between God and the children of Israel, the author writes that this peculiar covenant relationship proclaimed God's preference for a freely given obedience. This signalled the divine intention that man's life should be ruled by his choices and was the historic Hebrew affirmation of free will. As the ancient Hebrews were His chosen people, so He was their chosen God.

In his brief analysis of the biblical story of Job, Boorstin writes, "Why would a good God allow evil in the world He had created?

In discussing Kierkegaard, (1813-1853), the earliest of the existentialists, Boorstin indicates that "the classic parable of the terrifying responsibilities of existence is the story of God's command to Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac to prove his faith. For God's demand violated all the accepted rules of morals and of religious, civil, and family law."

Did God have a right to demand such an immoral act of Abraham? And if so, did Abraham have a right to obey the command? Abraham faced a dreadful choice, a personal responsibility. Was there a "higher law" that overrules the moral law?

Abraham seemed ready to act as if he believed so. But God rescued him from the awful choice by providing a ram in the thicket to replace the sacrifice of Isaac. This parable became embodied in the Hebrew conscience as a divine command against human sacrifice.

Henri Bergson (1859-1941) the Jewish-French philosopher and man of letters was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1928.

A few weeks before his death at the age of 81, despite the exemption offered him, Bergson left his sickbed, in order to register as a Jew and to shame the German-inspired Vichy government that had barred Jews from holding educational posts in France.

The author asserts that Albert Einstein never stopped seeking. In 1955, the doctors had given up efforts to save him and he must have known he was at the point of death.

He asked to see his equations and his unfinished statement declining the presidency of Israel. He reportedly picked up his equations first and complained to his son at his bedside, "If only I had more mathematics."

This readable, sweeping history has some obvious shortcomings. The author's choices are all white and male and there is little indication of contributions from other parts of the globe.

Moreover, there are gaping omissions. Where are Da Vinci, Hobbes, Hume, Russell, Darwin, Mendel, Malthus? But Boorstin has written the book he intended, a splendid conclusion to a major literary and historical set of books. Numerous readers will be grateful.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

What Jews hold sacred

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

As Socrates discovered long ago, education is the attempt to formulate the right questions, not produce "correct" answers. In the morass of opinions that currently weigh down the debate over conversion to Judaism, it is this search for the right question that must set the tempo of discussion with students.

The problem has been variously formulated in a number of standard and often melodramatic queries: Who is a Jew? Who is a Rabbi? (Amos Oz's reference to the Orthodox delegitimization of Reform and Conservative clergy performing conversions) Who has the authority to judge other people's sincerity?

But five minutes in a classroom with kids who have active curiosity and a drive for the truth places the elusive central question right at the teacher's doorstep: What is Judaism?

This thinly veiled version of the old desert-island game – if you were stuck on a forsaken stretch of land, what books/ CDs/ food items would you bring if you could only bring a few? – challenges our community to decide what we feel a Jew must know and want to put into practice.

Should someone becoming Jewish be made to profess belief in God? Keep Shabbat? Eat only kosher food? Give 10 percent of their earnings to charity? Pray every day? Join a synagogue? Have a bar/bat mitzvah? All or none of the above? And if all, then who among us can aspire to such a standard? If none, then Judaism dies, in the words of Anthony Flew, the "death of a thousand qualifications."

The presumed answer lies in the murky middle. But if, as we often hear, God lies in the details, then the God of conversion has become more elusive than ever.

Judaism, as Rabbi Marc Gellman has remarked, has the odd distinction of being an "open tribe." Certain religions can be joined simply by virtue of expressing allegiance to their central tenets of faith; such is the case with Christianity.

Tribal by nature

Other systems, such as that of native North Americans, are tribal by nature; birth is truly the defining characteristic for belonging. Judaism is both a birthright and yet a permanent open house, available to be examined in the marketplace of ideas and embraced through a gradual process of education and practical commitments.

Yet conversion calls the bluff on Jewish self-definition. Viewed through the eyes of the gentile consumer, Judaism is compelled to take inventory, present its finest goods and lay out a clear price list for their acquisition.

But what is the real price for joining a people, a tradition, a set of collective memories, a way of thinking, giving, being?

Recently my students were perturbed and appalled to learn that the traditional response to intermarriage in Jewish law was for the parents to sit shivah for their "lost" child, now dead to the ancestral legacy of Judaism. Did this really happen, they asked me, as though discussing the ancient ritual sacrifices of Mayan women. They could not conceive of any value, any tradition, any belief – all abstractions in their world view – standing in the way of parent-child contact and communication.

So, in Platonic fashion, I did not answer them, but left them with a question. What do you live for? And if someone betrayed and shredded the value that you hold more sacred than anything else on earth, what would you do?

More than a few gentiles, these days, are pondering what we Jews hold sacred and what it is they need do to join our ever fractious, always dreaming tribe.

Jewish Humor on the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Be happy it's Adar!

Well, it's almost Adar. And that's close enough for my third annual Be-Happy-It's-Adar Jewish Humor-on-the-Internet column.

And once again, my third annual disclaimer. The late, beloved Jewish humorist Leo Rosten said, "Humor is the affectionate communication of insight." Unfortunately, humor on the Internet can be much less than affectionate. I have tried to recommend sites which will entertain, but due to the changing nature of the World Wide Web, you never really know what you're going to come across. Which is a long way of saying the humor lane on the Jewish Highway can get quite bumpy. Proceed with caution.

There are now dozens of sites devoted to Jewish humor. One of the best and largest compilations of jokes is Lori's Mishmash Jewish Humor [http://www.geocities.com/CollegePark/6174/h--jewis.html]. You'll find everything from Yiddish proverbs (You can't chew with somebody else's teeth) to events of the Jewish Olympics (Bagel Toss and Naches Shlep).

Another favorite is the Narrishkeit Now site that includes Personals Ads Which Have Appeared in Israeli Papers [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Oracle/4929/silly6.htm]. The claim is that these ads are genuine: Yeshiva bochur, Torah scholar, long beard, payes. Seeks same in woman. Shochet, 54, owns successful butcher shop in Midwest; doesn't believe women should be treated like a piece of meat. Jewish businessman, 49, manufactures Sabbath candles, Chanukah candles, havdalah candles, Yahrzeit candles; seeks non-smoker.

Aside from telling jokes, Jews are all too familiar with being the butt of unwanted humor. Bernard Saper starts his fascinating analysis of Jewish Jokes and Anti-Semitism with this story: Sam and Irving are facing the firing squad. The executioner comes forward to place the blindfold on them. Sam disdainfully and proudly refuses, tearing the thing from his face. Irving turns to him and pleads: "Please Sam don't make trouble!" [http://www.ozcomedy.com/journal/11saper.htm]

Saper then poses and analyses some thought-provoking questions; "Is that joke funny? Would it be equally as funny if told by either a Jew or a gentile? To either a Jew or a gentile? With Yiddish accent or without? In mixed company? Is that joke antidote or fuel for anti-Semitism?" A highly recommended site.

OK back to the fun stuff. Here are some very large humor sites: Harry Leichter's Collection of Jewish Humor and Jokes [http://home.earthlink.net/~leichter/jhumorlink.htm], Jewish America [http://www.jewishamerica.org/humor.htm], Ahavat Israel [http://www.ahavat-israel.com/humor] and Montreal's Congregation Beth Tikvah [http://www.bethtikvah.qc.ca/humour.html].

If Adar is almost here, then Purim is just around the corner. So, thanks to Ohr Somayach, I leave you with some of the Ways to Know You've Drunk Enough on Purim: [http://www.ohr.org.il/judaism/humor/top10/topten.htm]. You hold a volume of the Babylonian Talmud upside down, thinking "Hey, they finally decoded the human genome!" You begin speaking Yiddish with a Sephardi accent. You ask people how many candles they lit last night. You argue with hamantashen…and lose.

More humor during Adar.

Government funding for day schools no panacea

By RABBI MARVIN PACHINO

Guest Voices

Several years ago, the Supreme Court ruled that government funding of Catholic separate schools is, indeed, legal, while religious schools of other faiths, together with other independent schools, have no claim to government funds.

I confess, however, that for more than one reason, I have never been enamored of the idea of seeking or accepting government funds for our day schools.

The hand that giveth is the hand that taketh. If the government decided today to provide funding for our Jewish educational system, our community would seize the offer. The fiscal structure of our schools would then be reorganized based upon the largesse of the government. However, tomorrow, or a few years from now, this government or its successor might have compelling reasons to significantly reduce, or entirely withdraw, its funding. That would create a financial crisis with which our schools and the community would be totally unprepared to grapple, and the whole Jewish educational edifice could fall apart.

Another scenario, one with which Jewish schools in other jurisdictions have been confronted, is the matter of conditions that may be attached to government funding, immediately or in the future, that would impinge upon the quantity and quality of the Judaic component of our curricula. We run the very real risk of losing control of that which is the soul of our enterprise.

The Ministry of Education cannot be expected to be sensitive or sympathetic towards the philosophy and purpose of the Jewish school system. Core subject areas in our Judaic curricula may be squeezed, or pushed out altogether, by the growing tendency of the ministry to denigrate the place of the humanities and culture, especially in the high school curriculum, in favor of preparing young people for the job market.

This process is well underway already. If the Jewish schools become the dependents of government, we will have much less freedom to manoeuvre.

For us, Jewish education is inexorably linked to the transmission of our faith and cultural heritage. All studies have indicated that Jewish education is the key to conveying the knowledge of the spiritual wealth and the inner meaning with which Judaism can endow our lives, and for cultivating lasting commitments to the mission of the Jewish people. We cannot conceive of a Jewish community in the future without a strong Jewish educational system.

Why, then, should we even contemplate relinquishing our control over our own destiny, or entrusting it to a temporal state that is, at best, indifferent towards it?

I am not unaware of the financial desperation that is driving many well-intentioned people in this direction. Unfortunately, our community has not gotten on with the job of creating an appropriate and adequate funding apparatus for day school education. According to an article in The Canadian Jewish News (Dec. 10, 1998), the pursuit of government funds for Jewish education continues to preoccupy our leadership and "is the top issue on the [Canadian Jewish] Congress agenda." As if that will be our salvation.

There is no question! Parents are seriously burdened by the skyrocketing costs of a Jewish day school education. A large segment of middle-class families, not to speak of those in lower income brackets, has already been precluded from sending its children to Jewish day schools. However, I still contend that pursuing government funds is not the answer.

The answer lies within our own community!

If we can swallow our pride and look south of the border, where no Jewish school receives government funds, we might discover a model that is replicable here in Toronto.

Operation Jewish Education: The Five Percent Answer has been initiated in Chicago, where it is receiving the active support of the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago and the community at large. Their objective is to raise $300 million over the next seven to 10 years, with a seven percent annual payout. The annual yield of $21 million would pay the full tuition of every child currently in the Chicago day school system.

To achieve this goal, every Jew is mandated to will five percent of his or her estate to a day school endowment fund. In turn, each day school and yeshiva in Chicago has opened an institutional endowment fund in its own name. Furthermore, the Chicago Jewish Federation has agreed to assist and join in a strategic partnership to help raise substantial monies to fund the endowment accounts. The Jewish Federation has also undertaken to match monies raised by individual day school endowment funds with a 10 percent contribution.

Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis, together with prominent industrialists, professors, authors, philanthropists and organizational leaders have joined together in this undertaking.

The full particulars of Operation Jewish Education: The Five Percent Answer are too vast to mention here, but they are in the hands of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

If we believe in the paramount importance of Jewish education and the need to make it accessible to every Jewish child, then we too must firmly grasp the reins of our own destiny. We have the people and we have the resources. Do we have the will?

Swiss funds proposal

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Holocaust survivor has proposed that the $2.5-million (US) Swiss fund allocated for needy Canadian survivors be used to provide a home for orphans in Israel.

Only a nominal sum of $130 will be given to each survivor if the 16,000 to 18,000 who are eligible all apply, and the money should go to Israel, said Henry Neugebauer of Richmond Hill.

Neugebauer said if the orphanage home cost only half a million, the balance could be invested to look after maintenance costs.

The Richmond Hill resident said he would be interested in some quick way of getting all the Holocaust survivors to agree to his suggestion.

In this way, survivors would be doing something for the future of Jewry. Their contribution could be acknowledged in a book of names honoring the survivors, he said.

UWO marks Tu b'Shvat by recycling

LONDON, ONT. — This generation of students is sometimes viewed as apolitical, in contrast to the '60s and '70s when marches, demonstrations and sit-ins were a staple of campus life. But today's students have not stopped caring.

To coincide with Tu b'Shvat, Nadia Sapiro, an executive member of the Jewish Students' Union (JSU) at the University of Western Ontario, organized a recycling bin drive at the university. Sapiro "thought this would be a good way to celebrate the holiday. Instead of just planting new trees, it is preventing further deforestation."

Recycling is something many students do not think about, said Sapiro. Because provincial funding for waste management has been cut dramatically, the city of London no longer gives out free blue boxes.

Students who live off campus – as do almost 25 percent of JSU members – "lead highly transient lifestyles and therefore tend to make fewer investments in their homes," according to a JSU news release.

Few of them know where to get a recycling bin, what they can put in it, and even fewer of them realize that it is their responsibility, said Sapiro.

The project, through which the JSU provided 150 blue boxes at a cost of $3 – as opposed to the usual $6.49 plus tax – was funded through the Green Plan Commission at the university, Hillel International and the JSU.

The city of London supported the endeavor by printing flyers explaining how and when to recycle.

Sapiro hopes the program will have a ripple effect. "It is our goal that not only will students recycle more, but they will also take more responsibility for the [about] 1.7 kg of waste that we as Canadians, produce each day."

For Tu b'Shvat, the JSU also provided about 30 parsley plants to students. Everyone can use parsley, said Sapiro. The popular herb served as a good educational tool, providing the JSU with an opportunity to explain about the role of parsley at Passover, she said.

schools. Jewish children with the same special needs are not able to avail themselves of these health services," Landy told the premier.

He commended the premier for his new announcement on the health support services.

The CJC Ontario region also announced that Minister of Education Dave Johnson will make a first-ever visit Feb. 16 to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and to She'arim, a school for Jewish students with special needs.

In his major address to a standing room only crowd at the executive meeting of the CJC Ontario region and at media scrum following his speech, Harris spoke of his call for a code of non-violence in Ontario schools, but said nothing about aid for faith schools.

The premier departed from his prepared text on behavior in the schools to say, "Perhaps your own Jewish schools, among others, have something to contribute."

It was only when he returned from the scrum to mingle with executive members, that The CJN had a chance to ask him directly about the issue of funding.

He then said that aid to Jewish schools is not on the agenda. "Our first priority is to establish respect for our public school system," he said. "Our second priority is to give equal opportunity to all children and perhaps under this we can give consideration to new funding."

After listening in the post-meeting time to Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Synagogue, the premier agreed to continue dialogue with him on what the Jewish schools could do to help develop a code of behavior for schools in Ontario.

Beside Harris' speech, the other major agenda item at the meeting was the presentation of a plaque to congratulate Ted Chudleigh, the Conservative backbencher who piloted the Holocaust Memorial Yom Hashoah bill through the Ontario legislature, making it one of the few jurisdictions outside Israel to officially mark the Holocaust.

The crowd burst into applause when Chudleigh was honored with the plaque presented by Nate Leipciger on behalf of the Ontario region and the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto.

Later Harris said he agreed with the Congress position and a request from Leipciger that the next step is to follow the Holocaust legislation with a curriculum that extends such education into the schools.

On Chudleigh's bill, the premier said he presented an autographed copy of it to the director of Yad Vashem in Israel even before it was officially passed. "I told him it had my support and I was sure it would become law."

His voice breaking with emotion, Chudleigh said there is a simple concept behind the bill – "never again."

"I've had an amazing response since," he said. "People have told me they have a new sense of purpose and dignity since this bill passed."

Traves leads Dalhousie U.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

At the age of 50, Thomas Donald Traves seems to have reached the apex of Canadian academia nirvana.

He is not only one of Canada's youngest college presidents, but the first Jewish president of Dalhousie University in Halifax.

Traves – a historian who was a senior administrator at York University by 33 – seems nonchalant about the fact that Dalhousie, Nova Scotia's largest university, saw fit to appoint a Jewish president after nearly two centuries of existence.

"Over the past 30 years, a number of Jewish academics have become university presidents in Canada, so it is no longer the rare event that it would have been prior to that," he said.

Traves is right. In the waning year of the millennium, national universities such as McGill, Concordia and Guelph are also headed by Jewish presidents.

Yet, in an earlier era, the groves of Canadian academe, like Canadian society itself, were rigidly exclusionary and racist, riddled by an overt brand of anti-Semitism which would have precluded Traves from consideration as a university lecturer, let alone a president.

Those days, thankfully, appear to be long gone, and consequently, scholars cum-administrators like Traves can flourish to their fullest potential.

Traves, whose grandparents on both sides hail from small towns near Minsk, was born and raised in Winnipeg, the son of Samuel and Marjorie, a couple whose parents immigrated to the prairies around 1900.

His late father, a chemical engineer with Canada Cement Lafarge, and his mother, an office worker, both valued education. Being typical Jewish parents, they brilliantly succeeded in imparting these values to their two children.

The intellectually precocious Traves excelled at West Kildonan Collegiate. And at the University of Manitoba, he studied history.

"I took history as a student because I have always been interested in the inter-relationship of social, economic, cultural and political phenomena, how change in one sphere flows from or impacts in other spheres."

After graduating, he and his bride, Karen Posner, went east to Toronto. There, at York University, he completed MA and PhD degrees. Since then, he has specialized in business and labor issues. "My research has focused on relations between business and government in Canada, as well as industrial relations in the 19th and 20th centuries."

Traves, whose writings touch upon railway workers, the automobile and sugar refining industries, and price controls, taught economic and political history at York until 1991.

After having been chair of the social science division for two years, he was named dean of the faculty of arts, a position he held for eight years.

Drawn to administration by his interest in "creative organizational development," Traves was, by all accounts, an able dean, a superb "person-person" and a fine judge of character, according to those who know him.

He participated in the introduction of a series of new academic programs. He expanded enrolment. And he was instrumental in hiring a new generation of scholars who, he believes, "will define the shape of (York) over the next two decades."

As dean, Traves drew heavily on his experience as a teacher.

"My duties as dean differed from my role as as professor insofar as I needed to achieve consensus among my colleagues on new project ideas, motivate change and ensure follow through."

Thomas Donald Traves

But as an administrator, Traves discovered that he required skills normally associated with teaching, namely clear analysis of challenges and effective communication.

Good administrators, he observed, utilize the skills of teachers to present ideas and motivate colleagues.

During this period, he worked as a part-time labor arbitrator for the Ontario government. "This exposed me to a wide range of work-place issues and proved to be excellent training for academic administration and policy making," he explained.

From 1991 until 1995, Traves was vice-president (academic) of the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton, where he was also a professor in the department of history.

There, he noted, he strived to develop closer relations with the local community, to promote the importance of the university and to ensure accessibility to higher education.

"I also introduced a strategic planning process to ensure academic program renewal."

Traves has been president and vice-chancellor of Dalhousie, with 13,500 students on a 79-acre campus in the heart of Halifax, since July 1995.

He has been busy, to say the least.

Under his presidency, Dalhousie's merger with the Technical University of Nova Scotia has been brought to fruition; new academic programs and research institutes have been established; a $75 million fundraising campaign has been completed; the construction of three new academic buildings, the first in 20 years, has begun; and a fresh strategic plan has been unveiled.

These developments, he claimed, have endowed Dalhousie with "a renewed sense of confidence."

Looking ahead, Traves plans a major expansion of Dalhousie's information technology activities and a new emphasis on programs and research related to the province's offshore oil and gas industry.

"I also anticipate additional campus development and increased government support for research, particularly in medicine and technology transfer."

Asked to elucidate his philosophy of education, Traves said that the modern university should serve a variety of goals.

"At its core, however, stands a commitment to provide a liberal education that develops an inquiring mind and the critical intellectual skills needed to pursue continuous learning and informed action."

To succeed, a university president must possess certain qualities.

"A president needs to be patient and persistent, take a broad view of social and cultural developments, be active in championing new ideas and forging internal and external partnerships to achieve results, and effectively communicate the traditional and emerging objectives of a university in a fast changing knowledge economy."

Traves, whose outside interests run the gamut from jazz and art to movies and golf, invariably begins his day at 8 a.m. It often ends with evening functions which last until 10 or 11 p.m.

"I'm usually out three or four nights a week," he said. "Most of my day is spent in meetings or conversations. I also attend a great many events so as to develop the network of relationships that are necessary to promote the university's interests."

He and his wife, a psychotherapist with a private practice, have two children. Will is a math instructor at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md. Julie works in marketing and advertising for Penguin Books in Toronto.

A member of a Halifax synagogue, Traves partakes in the Jewish life of the city.

Amost four years into his term, it seems clear that Traves' Jewish sensibilities have had and will have an impact on Dalhousie.

Two examples will suffice.

He has enlarged the scope of Hebrew language education at the university.

And he hopes to forge closer relations between Dalhousie and Israeli universities.

World can't prevent genocide, conference told

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL— Fifty years after the end of the Nuremberg Nazi war crimes trials, the world has not learned how to deal effectively with those who commit genocide or other crimes against humanity, and more disturbingly, it seems incapable of preventing such atrocities, said Ontario Court of Appeal judge Rosalie Abella.

"We have no international mechanism to prevent the ongoing slaughter of children and other innocent civilians, and no overriding sense of moral responsibility that informs us and helps develop a consensus for when responsive military action is required to protect human rights," said Abella, a keynote speaker at an international conference on human rights at McGill University.

"We have, in fact, no consensus on what our international moral responsibilities are – period – and that is why we are so desperately lacking in enforcement mechanisms, legal and otherwise."

The gap between the values the international community espouses and the values it is prepared to enforce is so wide, Abella said, that almost any country can carry out abuses with impunity.

"No national abuser seems to worry whether there will be a 'Nuremberg' trial later, because usually there isn't, and in any event, by the time there is, all the damage that was sought to be done, has been done, with or without the backdrop of war."

Trials are a response, not a solution, Abella believes. Prevention of the acts that necessitate them is what the world should be aiming for.

"We cannot simply sit back and watch the horrors occur, knowing our indignation will be mollified by subsequent judicial reckoning. Where injustice is preventable, it should be prevented when first identified, not permitted first to create its human devastation before being held to account."

Nuremberg represents for her "the failure of decent, well-meaning Western democratic nations to respond when they should have and could have" to the virulent anti-Semitism in Germany in the 1930s.

Moreover, the commitment to justice that the trials represented was "all too fleeting." With the Cold War preoccupying the West, there would be no more Nazi war crimes prosecutions after 1949 for over two decades, and then it was because Jews did not stop pressing for justice.

Abella said her views have been shaped by her personal history and being Jewish. The child of Holocaust survivors, she was born in Stuttgart, Germany, in 1946.

"Why hasn't the Holocaust, the single most outrageous crime in civilized history, created a desperate, unquenchable thirst for enforceable international norms that make human rights abuses intolerable anytime and anywhere they occur?" she asked.

Abella said that laws and courts are not the answer alone. After all, the Holocaust was not illegal under German law.

"What we need is a collaborative public consensus, nationally and internationally, that we will not tolerate a world order which tolerates injustice. We need to find a way to immunize ourselves from complacency, moral lethargy, self-serving rationalization, and stubborn self-denial."

Abella was speaking at a conference entitled Hate, Genocide and Human Rights: Fifty Years Later, co-sponsored by the law faculty and InterAmicus, a human rights advocacy centre headed by Prof. Irwin Cotler. The occasion was the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Genocide Convention.

Rosalie Abella

"The judgment on Nuremberg, 50 years later is a lament. We have forgotten too many of its lessons too quickly, and we must try to remember them before the next 50 years renders the memories meaningless," Abella concluded.

The conference brought together lawyers, government officials, non-governmental organization representatives, human rights activists and students interested in the theme of What Have We Learned? What Must We Do? in the wake of continuing gross human rights violations around the world, and in particular the role of international legal remedies.

The McGill/InterAmicus Robert S. Litvack Human Rights Memorial Award was presented at the end of the conference to Benjamin Ferencz, U.S. prosecutor at Nuremberg and an early proponent of an international criminal court; and to Philippe Kirsch, a Canadian who played a key role in the negotiations toward the establishment of such a court.

Ferencz was the chief U.S. prosecutor in the trial against the SS extermination squads convicted of killing over a million people and played a leading role in negotiating German restitution to victims of Nazi persecution.

For over 50 years, he has been an outspoken advocate for the establishment of an international criminal court, and was the sole remaining Nuremberg judge to address the conference in Rome last year where a treaty on the creation of such a court was drawn up.

Kirsch, a career diplomat, chaired the committee at the Rome conference that established the international criminal court. He now chairs the United Nations committee drafting a new international strategy against nuclear terrorism.

Previously, he served as ambassador and deputy permanent representative of Canada to the UN and to its Security Council. He was cited for this contribution to the development of international human rights law.

The award is named after the McGill law graduate who was a tireless advocate for aboriginal rights. It was established by his family after Litvack died of cancer in 1987.

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's rabbis are giving the thumbs-down to Reform Rabbi Michael Levenson's stated intention to perform gay and interfaith marriages.

The Winnipeg Council of Rabbis has officially condemned Rabbi Levenson's stand, while Rabbi Moshe Stern, an ordained Orthodox rabbi who teaches at the University of Manitoba, describes Temple Shalom, Rabbi Levenson's synagogue, as "an interfaith centre" rather than a synagogue.

"Aside from a violation of my best judgment about what Judaism is, I think that this has to do with the survival of the community," says Rabbi Stern. "It violates the boundaries of what we can still define as Judaism."

Rabbi Stern has written a letter to the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) asking the council to debate the issue and take a stand. The WJCC has declined to get involved.

Meantime, five of the eight rabbis who comprise the Winnipeg Council of Rabbis (WCOR) have signed a public statement, issued at their Jan. 14 meeting, which expresses "disappointment that a new member of our community has decided to announce that he will officiate at both interfaith and same-sex marriages.

"While we acknowledge his right to act within the parameters of the movement of which he is a part," the statement continues, "at the same time, we fear that this step is fraught with danger to the Jewish community. Interfaith marriages in particular present a clear and present danger to the future of the Jewish world. Approval of interfaith marriages, which is implicit in a rabbi's willingness to officiate at them, will lead to communal suicide."

Two members of the WCOR declined to endorse the statement. (Rabbi Levenson is also a WCOR member but was unable to attend the Jan. 14 meeting.) While rabbis Neal Rose and Allan Green are opposed to rabbis officiating at interfaith marriages, they are sympathetic to marriages between gay individuals where both partners are Jewish.

"I feel uncomfortable excluding gay couples from the realm of sanctity," says Rabbi Green of the Beth Israel Synagogue, "although I am in no position to conduct such ceremonies. I feel that gay Jews have a tremendous contribution to make to the life of our community."

Rabbi Levenson came to Winnipeg in the fall to lead Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's only Reform congregation. He stated his intentions to the board before he was hired and has the full support of his congregation, 30 percent of whom are in interfaith marriages already.

Katriuk's evidence 'difficult to accept': judge

ing to the Canadian Citizenship Act, although one of Katriuk's lawyers, Nestor Woychyshyn, stated that there is, "presumably...some room for appeal."

In his 98-page judgment, Judge Marc Nadon found that Katriuk, who was born in the Ukrainian village of Luzhany and had been a voluntary member of Ukrainian battalion 118 in Byelorussia (now Belarus) under the control of the Waffen SS, gained illegal entry by using a false birth date and name – Nicholas Schpirka – and by concealing his membership in the battalion, when he applied in Paris to come to Canada in 1951.

The unit was implicated in numerous atrocities in the Ukraine, including the deaths of thousands of Jews in Belarus between 1941 and 1944.

"I find it difficult, if not impossible, to accept the respondent's [Katriuk's] evidence that he did not participate in any important military operation while his battalion was in Byelorussia," Nadon wrote.

"This is simply not plausible. I find the respondent must have participated in at least some operations in which his battalion was involved between 1942 and 1944."

While Nadon had no proof that Katriuk was directly involved in atrocities against civilians, he said that Katriuk, "clearly was not prepared to answer fully the questions put to him regarding his participation in Battalion 118..."

Nadon also ruled that at the time Katriuk applied to come to Canada, he, "must...have been asked to answer the two questions that appear on...[immigration form] O.S. 8..., namely details regarding the longest job he had in the last 10 years and the number of jobs he had during those 10 years.

"On the evidence before me, I can only find that the respondent did not truthfully answer those questions," Nadon wrote. "The respondent's evidence was simply that the visa officer did not ask him anything. I do not find his version of events plausible."

Nadon found that even though in 1957 when he applied for citizenship, Katriuk notified the federal government that he had come to Canada in 1951 under a false name, the citizenship was granted [in 1958] based on Katriuk's false statement that "he took refuge in France in 1944."

In late 1944, Katriuk left the German camp to join the French underground. "However, in my view, it cannot be said by any stretch of the imagination that the respondent 'took refuge in France in 1944.' That is simply not the case," Nadon said.

For all the above reasons, Katriuk "was not lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence [and is] deemed to have obtained his Canadian citzenship by false representation or fraud, or by concealing material circumstances contrary to the Citizenship Act."

Katriuk's case took almost 2½ years for the Federal Court to rule on, from the time the minister of citizenship and immigration notified Katriuk in Aug. 1996, of its intention to seek to have his citizenship revoked.

Court proceedings against him began in Dec. 1997, with final arguments presented before Nadon last July.

The seven months it took Nadon to rule on the case may have been delayed by the efforts of a local legal researcher, Kenneth Narvey, to have Nadon recuse himself for what Narvey perceived to be a "reasonable apprehension of bias," based on transribed remarks Nadon made during the course of his hearing last June and July.

Although Silverstone had backed Narvey to the extent of sharing "concerns" over certain of Nadon's remarks, he said that, "a long time ago, I gave up trying to predict outcomes or judging motivations."

Narvey, for his part, said that, "it appears that I was mistaken, and I am glad to learn that I was mistaken."

The government, through the preliminary work of the Justice Department's War Crimes Unit, has launched 15 deportation cases over the last 3½ years, with "three or four" more expected to be announced this year, Silverstone said.

The accelerated pace has heartened Jewish officials, who for years complained about the federal government dragging its heels in rooting out alleged Nazi collaborators who found safe haven in Canada following World War II.

Of the 15 (besides Vitols and Dueck), three individuals have died, three are awaiting trial, and two are currently before the courts.

Two others left Canada voluntarily, while one facing imminent deportation — Wasily Bogutin — has claimed refugee status.

Collins loses human rights case

Holocaust denial and allegations of a Jewish conspiracy.

Abrams, who runs his own advertising business, testified before the tribunal that he raised the complaint "because of a...security concern, because of what happened in history against my people [and because of] my own experience that I've had with anti-Semitism...I wanted to do something, perhaps, that could stem the matter and [to show] these are distortions...Nobody should have to endure this."

Patch ordered Collins and the North Shore News to pay $2,000 to compensate Abrams "for injury to dignity and feelings of self-respect.", Patch found Collins' columns "contribute to the hatred of the Jews because his writings echo the themes and anti-Semitic canards found in the history of anti-Semitism. He promotes mistrust and contempt by suggesting Jews are deceitful and conspire to swindle the non-Jewish world for their own gains.

"Collins poses as a dauntless civil libertarian and a champion of free speech. The pose has made it possible for him to continue publishing his anti-Semitic diatribes in newspapers such as the North Shore News. Access to publication makes him credible to some of those who are already inclined to be anti-Semitic, and to those who tend be believe anything that appears in print."

The B.C. Human Rights Commission, the Attorney General of British Columbia and the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada joined in the case as interveners.

Marvin Kurz, national legal counsel for the League, said the Abrams decision does not reverse the finding in the earlier Congress case.

"It appears you need to have a pattern. You've got to be bad more than once," Kurz said.

The tribunal also appeared to reject his contention that an anti-Semitic column in itself is hateful. That part of the decision puzzled him because "if it isn't [hateful], I don't know what is," Kurz said.

That part of the judgment "panders to hatemongers who say they're providing justifiable comment on Jewish 'misdeeds'," he added.

Abrams called the tribunal's decision "a defeat for [Collins'] version of free speech, which includes outright lies and distortions."

When he first read Collins' columns almost five years ago, he was outraged at the content, Abrams said. "I felt they were not going to make a mockery of murder and genocide. We have to challenge it, fight it. We can't let it pass and forsake the memories of those who were murdered," he said.

McGill Jewish department moves

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Bidding shalom to the old greystone on Peel Street that had been its home since 1971, the Jewish studies department of McGill University packed up and moved to its new digs at 3438 McTavish St.

The department was forced out of its long-time headquarters because McGill is expanding its student-services building on McTavish Street, which is behind the former Jewish studies building.

The faculty, however, is shedding no tears over the loss of its old home. The new place is bigger, in better condition and closer to the main campus, said Jewish studies chair Gershon Hundert.

The new place is an old home, known as Lindsay House, and most recently was used by McGill for general offices. Its next-door neighbor is the East Asia studies program.

"The place has been completely renovated," Hundert said. "We had been begging McGill for years to renovate our old place without success. It was very, very rundown. The ceiling was falling in...There's zero nostalgia for it."

There's plenty of space for offices for the department's 8½-member faculty, which is made up of one part-time and four full-time professors, he said.

The classrooms are larger and better equipped, however, they only hold 25 students, he said, noting that those classes with larger enrolment, like the one on the Holocaust, are held elsewhere.

The Jewish teacher training program, which is part of the department, is now, for the first time, held in a different venue . It has relocated to the education department, which Hundert said is more appropriate.

"In this new location, Jewish studies is more integrated into the campus, more visible, less marginal," he concluded.

Raising the profile of Jewish studies has become a priority for the department, which celebrated its 30th anniversary last year, he said.

The department received a significant boost that year when the Cummings and Segal families gave it a $2-million gift, which has helped offset university cutbacks, he said. This move, however, has been funded totally by McGill, he added.

Although several Canadian universities have Jewish studies programs, McGill lays claim to have the only department in that discipline. "And there are only about five Jewish studies departments in the United States," Hundert said.

About 600 students take Jewish studies courses, which include Jewish history, literature and thought; rabbinics and Bible; and Hebrew, Yiddish and Aramaic. About 20 students are majoring in Jewish studies and at least a dozen others have minors in the subject.

In addition, close to 20 others are in the teacher training program.

The department grants bachelor's, master's and doctoral degrees. Hundert noted that this year, for the first time, two students are completing PhDs.

Last fall, to mark its 30th year, the department launched a lecture series entitled, The Academy Reports to the Community, which is geared to the public . The project is an attempt to bring the latest developments in the Jewish studies field to the layperson.

Hundert admitted that the first three lectures in the series were poorly attended. He said he hopes attendance will improve when the two remaining lectures in the series take place in the spring.

On March 11, Robert Goldenberg of the State University of New York at Stony Brook will speak on ancient Judaism at McGill's Leacock building, room 232; and on April 15, Derek Penslar of Indiana University will give a talk on modern Jewish thought, at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Shalom. Both lectures will be held at 7:30 p.m.

"The people we are bringing in really are at the top of their field, and they can speak in a way that anyone will appreciate," Hundert said.

The series will culminate with a two-day conference called At the Cutting Edge of Jewish Studies: The Most Recent Developments in the Field, which will take place at McGill May 9 to 10. Participants will include scholars from Harvard, Brandeis, Cornell, Yale, McGill and Concordia universities.

Chai, Rusalka team up

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Chai Folk Ensemble is breaking new ground.

At its annual winter concert, to be held March 2 and 3, the troupe will be performing, for the first time ever, with Winnipeg's leading Ukrainian dance group, the Rusalka Ukrainian Dance Ensemble.

Rusalka, formed in 1962, two years before Chai, has toured the world performing for royalty and the Pope.

Chai did its first tour of Israel in November, and has performed throughout North America.

In the joint concert, Rusalka will perform three of its own pieces. The grand finale, choreographed by Alberto Zirlinger, will see the two groups fuse their styles in a synthesis of cultures.

"The rehearsals have been very positive," says Chai artistic director Tamar Barr. "The groups have come together very quickly under Zirlinger's direction."

She says that Zirlinger, the former artistic director of Festival Aviv Carlos Halpert, Mexico City's annual celebration of Israeli dance, is the best choreographer to weld the two dance groups together because of his experience with ethnic dance groups.

Mohammed's descendant born to be king

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Looking back, it seems clear that King Hussein bin Talal of Jordan, who died Sunday at a hospital in Amman, knew that his days were numbered seven months ago when he was told that cancer had returned to his body. The king was first diagnosed with cancer in 1992.

On July 14, 1998, at the end of a meeting with members of the Labor party, the king said, "We do not have much time." He called on both the Israeli and Palestinian sides to resolve their differences, to put aside trivialities and to concentrate on completing peace.

Hussein's words took on an even greater significance four months later, when, haggard and exhausted, he left his hospital bed and infused the Wye Plantation signing ceremony with his personal charm, his many years of experience, his regal stature and his authority. The inescapable conclusion then was that the ceremony was a farewell gathering for the king of Jordan.

For six months during his cancer treatment in the United States, the people of Jordan had been waiting for the return of their king – a monarch who, for them, was not just a leader, but a father. Hussein enjoyed not only great respect from his subjects, but an unusual love, as well. "Our master" is how the Jordanians addressed their monarch.

He was a 42nd-generation direct descendant of the Prophet Mohammed. The Hashemite family, or Bani Hashem, is today the most respected royal family in the Muslim world.

King Hussein, who after 47 years on the Jordanian throne was the longest-serving head of state in the world, was born on Nov. 14, 1935, to Talal bin Abdullah and Zein al-Sharaf bin Jamil.

In 1916, at the time of the great Arab revolt, Hussein's great-grandfather, Hussein ben Ali, led the struggle to liberate Arab lands from the Ottoman Empire. In the years following, Hussein ben Ali's sons, Abdullah and Faisal, ruled Jordan, Syria and Iraq.

King Abdullah, Hussein's grandfather, gained Jordanian independence from the British in 1946. His contact with leading Jewish and Zionist figures, including Chaim Weizmann and Golda Meir, was well known, and at home, he was considered to be too moderate, a Zionist collaborator.

In July 1951, he was murdered by a lone Palestinian assassin on the steps of the al-Aksa Mosque compound in Jerusalem. His grandson Hussein was at his side when he was killed, but was spared, according to legend, thanks to a medallion his grandfather had given him shortly before the assassination.

Hussein's father, Talal, was crowned shortly after Abdullah's death, in accordance with Jordanian law (amended in 1965), which then stated that the king must pass the crown to his oldest son. Because of his poor mental condition, Talal's reign ended after just one year and the crown was passed to Hussein, who had not yet turned 18.

While the legal authority to rule was granted him on May 2, 1953, Hussein always celebrated the anniversary of his coronation on the date he was formally crowned king – Aug. 11. Last year, Hussein failed to celebrate this date on Jordanian soil for the first time in his life, while undergoing intensive chemotherapy at the Mayo Clinic.

Royal Hashemite family

Having completed his elementary education in Amman, Hussein attended Victoria College in Alexandria, Egypt, and Harrow in England, where he later sent his sons. He received his military education at the Royal Military Academy at Sandhurst, England, now attended by Prince Hamza, the first of the king's sons from his marriage to Queen Noor.

In the last letter he sent to his brother Prince Hassan, Hussein wrote of his great love for Hamza.

King Hussein will be remembered, among other things, as the leader who changed the face of Jordan and who dedicated his entire life to improving the lot of his subjects. The royal Hashemite family is proud of Hussein's achievements over his long reign, including raising the literacy rate from about 33 percent to almost 90 percent, and making running water and electricity – which at the time of Hussein's ascension to the throne were only available to some 10 percent of the population – available to all Jordanian citizens.

It will take some time before the world gets used to the phrase "Abdullah, king of Jordan."

Abdullah celebrated his 37th birthday recently; his father was almost two decades younger when he assumed power in one of the Middle East's most delicate countries, one of the few whose continued existence is uncertain.

Jordan is surrounded by wily old-timers, who in the not-so-distant past have looked longingly at the neighboring kingdom. During the last 12 months, especially during Hussein's absence, there have been reports in Jordan that Syria and Iraq have sent hundreds of their agents into the country with the aim of undermining the stability of the new regime.

Two weeks ago, in the last interview he gave, Hussein expressed regret that he was not always able to prevent disasters and crises, despite the warnings he had received. From the time he assumed power, Hussein sought to avert war in the region, knowing that Jordan was ill-equipped to absorb the costs of the pan-Arab attacks initiated by Egypt and Syria against Israel. He also knew, however, that he was likely to pay a heavy price for any apparent weakness.

The peace accord signed on Oct. 26, 1994 between Jordan and Israel was a pivotal milestone of Hussein's long reign, one for which he had been longing and toward which he had been working for 31 years, since his first meeting with an Israeli representative, Dr. Yaakov Herzog. Herzog, who met with Hussein in London, was the special envoy of the then-prime minister Levi Eshkol. Herzog coined the code name "Charles" for secret meetings with King Hussein and those closest to him.

During the three decades after that first London meeting, Hussein and his emissaries met with dozens of high-ranking Israeli officials, including prime ministers. Even the Six Day War, in which Jordan lost the West Bank and east Jerusalem, did not end the Israeli-Jordanian dialogue.

Before the outbreak of that war, the king, as usual, tried to manoeuvre between Israel and the Arab world. He asked Israel not to attack his kingdom in the event of an Arab attack, a request that was denied.

Yet there has always been agreement among successive Israeli governments that a strong and stable Hashemite neighbor is clearly in Israel's interest. It was in defence of this interest that in September 1970, Israel warned Syria against invading Jordan.

An official Jordanian source was later to say; "I will never forget what Israel did in September 1970, since it was that which made me understand that Israel and Jordan have a connection and that Israel will never allow the security of the kingdom to be compromised."

It was during the same period that Hussein used brutal force to put down a Palestinian revolt that threatened his regime.

Israeli interests were put to the test again three years later, during the Yom Kippur War. Israel, which was in the throes of a deep crisis, knew that it could reduce its forces along the banks of the Jordan, safe in the knowledge of Hussein's peaceful intentions.

In 1991, Israel respected Jordanian air space when addressing the question of destroying incoming Iraqi Scud missiles.

Throughout his reign, King Hussein knew that the close relationship he enjoyed with Israel could not be made official until a solution was found to the Palestinian issue; over 60 percent of his subjects are of Palestinian origin.

Hussein's support of Saddam Hussein during the Gulf War led to the monarch's international isolation. The king extracted himself from this position by signing a peace accord with Israel, almost overnight becoming a universally popular figure, not least with U.S. President Bill Clinton.

It is almost impossible to envisage Jordan without King Hussein.

Hussein known for dedication to his people hurting a lot about what happened. "I don't want to talk about the good or bad things he did. If you asked me who's better, Syrian President Hafez Assad or King Hussein, I'd say 100 times more, Hussein."

But Muktasib's neighboring shop owners don't all agree with his sentiments. At a spice shop four stores up from Muktasib, a Palestinian man in his 60's, said he is "upset about the death of a human being. About the king, I'm not upset. He's done very bad for Palestinians. There were secret talks between Israel and Jordan about the fate of the Palestinian people, without them consulting the Palestinian people."

"I'm not upset about the king's death," he reiterated.

Meanwhile, Jewish Israeli Corrine Kadouch, 29, has a feeling of uncertainty.

"I think the future is dark," said Kadouch. "There could be a coup d'etat...or Abdullah can by killed."

Jerusalem-based journalist Lisa Talesnick is also worried about the future of Jordan, but remains optimistic. "I love the man [Hussein]," she said. "He was a king in the true sense of the word. He did his terrible things like black September, but he's human."

"My hope and fantasy is that Abdullah's true kingly nature will emerge, but I'm nervous. It's not something you show overnight," she said. "Jordan had its king, and the king had His people."

In Canada, Moshe Ronen, president, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), in a letter to H.E. Samir M. Khalifeh, ambassador to Canada for the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, said, "The king has left behind a rich legacy as an international statesman, a beloved national leader and a man of peace whose reconciliation with Israel will help shape the destiny of the Middle East for generations to come.

"The king's efforts toward peace had far-reaching effects. In Canada, Jordan's rapprochement with its Israeli neighbors served to elevate efforts aimed at enhancing relations between the Jewish and Arab communities. We look forward to building on that foundation and working harmoniously together on issues of common concern to the future of Canadian society."

Ronen wished the new king of Jordan prosperity, good health and wise counsel, as he makes his mark toward a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. The achievement of this goal will be a most fitting tribute to the memory of the late King Hussein."

The Canada-Israel Committee also conveyed its condolences to the ambassador of Jordan to Canada. "Much like his grandfather, King Abdullah, whom he succeeded more than 40 years ago, King Hussein consistently sought ways to move towards peace with Israel, and contribute towards greater stability in the Middle East.

"Despite tensions over the years, successive Israeli governments, as well as Israelis in general, regarded the king as a partner in bridging the gulf between the Jewish state and the Arab world. The formal peace treaty signed between Jordan and Israel in 1994 cemented that relationship.

"King Hussein will be remembered for his dedication to his people and the moderating leadership role he assumed on many fronts. To Israelis and Jews the world over, he will also be remembered as a friend."

Born to be king

During the past few months, Jordan has become hysterical after each new announcement of the king's failing health. These announcements, also published in Israel, predicted the king's imminent death. One of the last such announcements was in October 1998, following the publication of the king's picture after a meeting with Ariel Sharon. The reaction in Jordan reflected concern and uncertainty over the unavoidable future – a future without "the father of the Jordanian people."

To encapsulate the life work of Hussein is a near-impossible task. Until his last day, Hussein was active in promoting peace, and said he wanted to die the hero's death of his friend Yitzhak Rabin.

Before he left his kingdom for his last effort at life-saving treatment in the United States, Hussein sent an open letter to his son Abdullah that was actually more of a message to his subjects; in it, he asked them to treat his son as they had treated him.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 1

• The founder of Hamas, Sheik Ahmed Yassin, began a hunger strike to protest the detention of what he called "political prisoners" in Palestinian jails.

Feb. 2

• Palestinian Authority (PA) security officials got into a shootout with three Hamas fugitives in the Gaza Strip. One PA official was killed; a Palestinian boy and girl were run over during an ensuing car chase. The three were later arrested along with 20 other Hamas activists.

• More than 140 Israeli academics, artists and public figures signed a petition calling for the establishment of a Palestinian state with eastern Jerusalem as its capital. The signatories included A.B. Yehoshua and Prof. Matanya Ben Artzi, the brother of Sara Netanyahu.

Feb. 3

• Israel reduced the sentence of five Jewish extremists serving prison terms for murder of Arab civilians. Israel's release of Palestinian prisoners in recent years justified the move, said Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi. Palestinian officials called the move a provocation.

Feb. 4

• Israeli jets struck targets in south Lebanon after Hezbollah fired rockets at Israel. None of the rockets landed in Israel, according to an army spokesperson.

• Religious pluralism is not a leading concern in Israel, Knesset member Alex Lubotsky told a delegation of 30 American Reform rabbis. "You need to take a broader look at Israeli society and not just look at your one issue," he said. Lubotsky, of the Third Way, was part of the Ne'eman Committee that was established to find moderate responses to pluralism issues in Israel.

Feb. 5

• "Don't say this is his final journey," was one of the headlines in Israeli newspapers, referring to the dying King Hussein, whose royal plane flew across Israeli skies to take him home to Amman.

Israel Election Notebook

May 17

• Opinion polls published last Friday by Gallup in Ma'ariv revealed the following levels of public support in the race for premiership:
– Benjamin Netanyahu, 36 percent
– Ehud Barak, 31 percent
– Yitzhak Mordechai, 21 percent
– Benny Begin, six percent

In a runoff vote, however, Barak would defeat Netanyahu 49 percent to 43 percent with eight percent undecided. Yitzhak Mordechai would defeat the prime minister 53 percent to 39 percent, with eight percent undecided.

• Gallup also published results of the public's views on the election campaign itself: 65 percent of the respondents believed the election campaign was more violent than previous campaigns. Six percent felt the campaign was less violent; 25 percent believed the campaign was much the same as previous ones.

• In a separate poll on the subject of campaign violence published the by Dahaf Institute in Yediot Aharonot, 55 percent of respondents believed the campaign was violent and that it endangered society; 13 percent felt the campaign was violent but did not endanger society; 20 percent found the campaign was not violent; nine percent offered no opinion.

Little opposition to trade deal with PA

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Canada will sign a free trade deal with the Palestinian Authority (PA) this month.

The inking of the deal is tentatively scheduled for Feb. 27. It will be signed by Canada's minister of international trade, Sergio Marchi, and his Palestinian counterpart, during Marchi's whirlwind Middle East trade mission from Feb. 22 to the 28th.

Earlier concerns that a free trade deal would be tantamount to support for Palestinian statehood have largely dissipated.

For one, this will not be a treaty, said Claude Demers, a spokesman for Canada's Foreign Affairs and International Trade ministry.

"It's a trade arrangement...a framework for cooperation," said Demers. "It's not a deal with a sovereign nation. Canada does not recognize Palestine. It's not a treaty, because a treaty implies a sovereign country."

Marchi's trade mission will take him to the West Bank, where the deal will be signed by Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Israel.

The minister will also "review" the two-year-old Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement, according to a statement.

That doesn't mean Canada is seeking changes to its free trade pact with Israel, Demers stressed.

"We want to see what progress has been made and to see if more can be done."

Two-way trade between Canada and Israel totalled $750 million in 1997, the first full year of the dropping of virtually all tariffs between the two countries. The figures represented a 40 percent jump in trade from the previous year.

Canada's deal with Israel included trade with the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Ottawa, however, pursued a separate agreement with the Palestinians.

Media reports last month said an Israeli outcry was expected should a free trade deal with the Palestinians go ahead.

Reports said the deal is a touchy subject for Israel and Jewish leaders in Canada because it would be seen as conferring the status of an independent Palestinian state.

However, Israel's embassy in Ottawa is at ease with the deal.

"We have no problem with the extension of benefits from the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement to the Palestinians," said David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada. "On the contrary, if any agreement can help improve the Palestinian economy, we support it."

Sultan said the pact conforms to all international norms.

Rob Ritter, executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), said he's "not especially concerned" with the signing of the deal.

"It was done in full consultation with Israel and to the satisfaction of Israel," Ritter said.

A statement from the CIC says the deal "should in no way be construed or misused as a statement on the part of Canada regarding the political status of the West Bank and Gaza Strip."

Harold Brief, who heads the Israel affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), also said his organization stands behind the trade deal with the Palestinians. "We very much support it."

However, a recent statement by CJC's Michael Elterman, who sits on the Israel affairs committee, sounded an opposite view.

Elterman was quoted as telling Vancouver's Western Jewish Bulletin that a Canadian trade deal with the PA is tantamount to support for Palestinian sovereignty.

"...By doing this, I think Canadian officials are de facto recognizing the Palestinian National Council (PNC) as the government of a future Palestinian state," Elterman was quoted as saying, adding he thought Ottawa should have waited for more progress in the peace process before signing a free trade deal with Palestinians.

Orthodox, Reform Jews clash in Jerusalem

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The gap separating the various streams of Judaism has again become all too apparent.

In a scene reminiscent of similar incidents at the Western Wall during the past few years, Israeli police restrained haredi demonstrators last week, as a delegation of American Reform rabbis held a mixed prayer service there.

Dozens of the demonstrators scuffled with police and heckled the worshippers as the service took place in a cordoned-off area of the Western Wall Plaza.

One member of the delegation, Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of the Association of Reform Zionists of America, said religious intolerance had made it necessary for his group to pray under police protection.

"This is a disgrace, that a group of Reform rabbis is penned up in this cage. This area does not belong to the protesters," he said.

A day before the prayer service was held, a coalition of American Orthodox Jews known as Am Echad, or One Nation, issued a statement decrying what it described as the "confrontation" created by the Reform delegation.

And in an ad appearing in the New York Times, Am Echad charged that U.S. Reform and Conservative leaders "want you to believe that Israel's Orthodox parties don't want to recognize American Jews as Jews.

"Far from undermining Jewish unity, Israel's Orthodox parties are trying to maintain it," the ad continued. "Let's cool the rhetoric and present our points of view with honesty and respect."

The Reform delegation's visit came a week after the Knesset passed legislation aimed at blocking the appointment of Reform and Conservative representatives to local religious councils.

During their visit, the delegation planned to meet with Israeli political leaders, including the centrist party's candidate for prime minister, Yitzhak Mordechai, who was criticized by liberal politicians after voting in favor of the religious councils legislation.

In a related development, haredi leaders are raising money to cover penalties that the High Court of Justice is imposing on the heads of some local religious councils.

The court is imposing the fines on those council leaders who ignore a recent court ruling ordering them to allow Conservative and Reform representatives to attend council meetings.

Recently, the court fined the head of the Jerusalem council some $7,300 (US) for failing to abide by the ruling.

The reaction of local Toronto rabbis to the fracas at the Wall mirrored denominational differences in Israel.

Rabbi Paul Golomb, director, Canadian Council for Reform Judaism placed the blame for the confrontation on the shoulders of the Israeli government.

"The thundering silence of the government speaks volumes," said Rabbi Golomb. The response of "hooligans" at the Western Wall, the opposition to women at the wall and to mixed services at the wall are "all of a piece."

To Rabbi Moshe Stern, head of the Vaad Haroboním, the council of Orthodox rabbis, the events at the Western Wall are "very, very sad."

He said the U.S. Reform rabbis have turned an ancient religious symbol into a political arena to further their personal agenda. Rabbi Stern criticized them for deliberately creating a spectacle at the wall.

"How would the media know about it if they were not attracted in advance by the Reform rabbis?"

Rabbi Barry Schneider of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue said: "The current atmosphere of intolerance is unfortunate.

"It would be very beneficial to get these matters out of religious spheres."

He also described the Knesset's bill barring Conservative and Reform rabbis from local religious councils as "unfortunate," but added, "I'm not sure that the means by the non-Orthodox movements to oppose it were right."

Passage of the legislation by the Knesset was "Orthodox blackmail" said Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple. The "hooliganism" at the wall during the confrontation is not unconnected to the Knesset's bill, Rabbi Marmur said. "Those in power tolerate the ultra-Orthodox for their votes."

Israelis mark 'passing of a noble friend'

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — As flags were lowered to half-mast last Sunday, Israeli officials and Knesset members expressed their grief over the death of Jordan's King Hussein and sent condolences to the Jordanian people. Many recalled meetings with the king and told stories of his humanity and kindness as they had experienced it.

"The Israeli people bow their heads at the passing of a noble friend," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said. Weizman described the late monarch as "perhaps Israel's best friend in the Middle East."

Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon said the Middle East and the whole world lost a great leader and Israel lost a true friend. Sharon expressed his condolences to Queen Noor; to the new king, Hussein's eldest son, Abdullah; to the king's family and to the Jordanian people.

Sharon emphasized that "we must continue to strengthen the friendly ties between Israel and the Jordanian kingdom."

Labor leader Ehud Barak said Israel laments the death of King Hussein, who "beat his swords into plowshares and his spears into pruning hooks. He who took part in bitter wars against us, turned into a warrior for peace. Together with the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, he pursued peace and achieved it, and laid the grounds for a new life of calm in the Middle East."

Barak said Israel owed Hussein a great debt. "I was lucky to meet him personally over the years, in trying times and in moments of success...I saw a courageous leader and a courageous man who was not deterred by difficult situations or decisions. I was lucky to be able to enjoy his wisdom, his pleasant manners and his blessings."

Industry and trade minister Natan Sharansky said, "I bow my head in memory of King Hussein – a great leader, a maker of peace and a pursuer of peace. He was the first leader in the Muslim world who understood the importance of strong and durable peace in our region... "I remember the king during the Wye summit," Sharansky added. "In spite of his terrible pain he came to invest his utmost to reach a peace agreement and to diminish the gaps between the sides. And despite his physical weakness, his spiritual strength radiated."

Defence minister Moshe Arens expressed his sorrow and the sorrow of the entire security establishment and the IDF over the death of "the great leader, neighbor, peace-warrior, King Hussein."

Former defence minister and chair of the centrist party, MK Yitzhak Mordechai said, "With tearful eyes, the people of Israel will accompany a true friend on his final journey." Mordechai said he was deeply impressed by the king's determination to anchor and deepen the peace between the Jordanian and Israeli peoples. He said that in his meetings with Hussein's heir, he learned that Abdullah was a great believer in peace and that he understood the mutual security and other interests shared by the two countries.

Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein recalled that when the government approved his appointment, King Hussein phoned him at home to congratulate him. Rubinstein said that in the 12 years that he knew the Jordanian monarch, he met with him several times and was especially impressed by his humanity. "I once spent Shabbat in London with Ephraim Halevy, of the Mossad, and we had to wait until the Sabbath ended before we could meet him. But King Hussein did not wait until the Sabbath was over. Instead he came to our hotel himself to keep us company," Rubinstein recalled.

The attorney general said the last time he spoke with the king was two weeks ago. "Then he sounded stronger and optimistic and expressed hope that he would be able to overcome his illness," Rubinstein said.

He said he does not know Abdullah, adding that he only shook his hand once during a meeting with the king.

Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon said the Israeli Knesset mourned the death of Hussein. "This courageous man is no longer with us, and that is very sad."

Doctor tackles male sexuality with advice, humor

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Most people squirm when they have to discuss sexual problems, yet many of them feel at ease telling jokes about the subject.

In a recently published book titled, Sex For Life: The Lover's Guide to Male Sexuality, (Apple Publishing, Vancouver), author Dr. David Saul tackles the subject from the medical/psychological perspective, and adds jokes and humorous quotations at the end of each chapter.

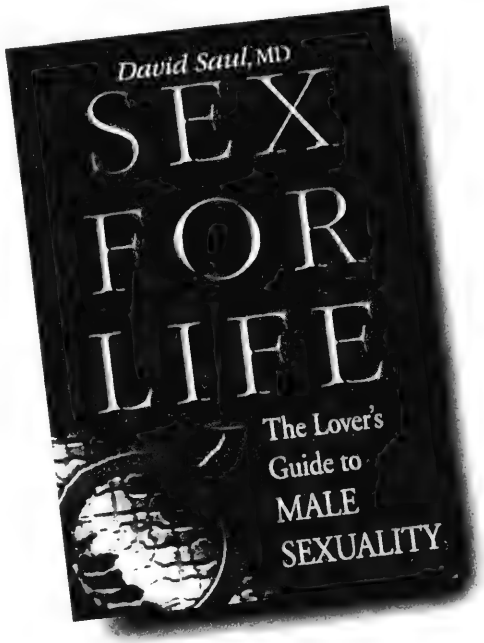
Saul is a family doctor in Scarborough who has led support groups for cancer patients, and has worked on breast cancer prevention projects. He has turned his focus to a comprehensive approach to men's sexual dysfunctions.

Saul combines alternative/complementary therapies with traditional medical treatments. He is a contributor to medical journals and newspapers, and he is a frequent guest on radio and television programs.

Two years ago, he joined the Midlife Health Centre as director of men's health programs. He is the only family doctor asked to join the Canadian Male Sexual Health Council among 12 Canadian urologists, and he is a member of the International Society for the Study of the Aging Male.

Saul has consulted for the pharmaceutical industry for products including, Viagra, Caverject, MUSE, Andriol, Flomax and Quest Vitamins.

Dr. David Saul



"From Viagra to vitamins to various techniques, my holistic health program will guide men to a lifetime of great sex," says Saul.

"And for women, they can learn how they can help their man overcome or prevent erectile dysfunction (ED), improve his health and develop a better relationship at the same time."

The vast majority of men, he says, are embarrassed to discuss any failing sexual performance, and are therefore reluctant to seek advice from their family doctor.

His research indicates that three things are happening: family doctors are not asking their male patients enough direct questions on sexual dysfunctioning; patients are not aware that effective medical treatments are available; and many doctors are not up to date with recent medical improvements in the treatment of these problems.

"My book, Sex For Life, may initiate that first call to the doctor."

He notes that medical conditions such as diabetes, angina, high blood pressure, and prostate cancer, are common causes of men's sexual dysfunction.

"The good news is that there are effective, rapid and easy-to-use treatments now available for males of all ages, not just older men."

Sex For Life contains techniques to deal with a number of problems such as work stress, marital problems, alcohol, and medication side effects.

There are chapters on depression, gender conflicts, male infertility, trauma and andropause (male menopause), why sexual dysfunction occurs, how to treat it, and most important, how to prevent it.

Saul says that "old medical dogma" states that some 75 percent of sexual problems are due to psychological problems, and 25 percent to medical problems.

"In the past 15 years, medical literature consistently and conclusively has been showing the reverse to be true; 75 to 85 percent of ED is due to medical concerns, and only 15 percent to psycho-social concerns."

The book has case studies, medical research, and step-by-step programs to improve (via natural means) diabetes, cholesterol, high blood pressure and lowered testosterone.

On the lighter side, an example of a closing quote is from comedian Jerry Seinfeld. "Men are like firemen. To us, sex is an emergency, and no matter what we're doing, we can be ready in two minutes."

Mount Sinai to benefit from research project

TORONTO — A multi-million dollar research partnership unveiled recently at Mount Sinai Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute will support medical research and ensure jobs for young researchers.

The Ontario Research and Development Challenge Fund, the Lunenfeld Institute, MDS Inc., Bristol-Myers Squibb and GlycoDesign are contributing almost $60 million in funds and equipment to the initiative.

The partnership will support projects in proteomics and bioinformatics, functional genomics and animal models of human disease, an industrial chair in glycobiology, and a research training program.

The government, through its Ontario Research and Development Challenge Fund is committing $11.9 million to the program, said Jim Wilson, Ontario minister of energy, science and technology.

An international camp experience in Israel

Camp Tapuz, established in 1981, brings campers together from as far afield as Los Angeles, Toronto, London, Sweden, Belgium, France and of course, Tel Aviv and Haifa.

Campers join us on our supervised flights, or directly at camp in Israel, where they spend from 1-5 weeks enjoying a unique combination of camp activities and touring Israel. They also enjoy meaningful Jewish and Zionist experiences, visiting the sites of Israel and understanding them through the eyes of their Israeli counterparts.

Accommodation is on kibbutz with all regular kibbutz facilities (clinic, dining-hall, shop etc.) close at hand. Rooms are air-conditioned and sports facilities include swimming pool, basketball and tennis courts, soccer field and a camping ground. Staff are all army graduates with experience in counselling.

There are 4 separate programs for different age gorups, as well as activities for the entire camp like "colour war" and "Tapuz Israel day."

Food is kosher and creative, non-denominational Shabbat services are held.

For the past 18 years, Tapur campers have forged life-long international friendships, maintained by e-mail, letters and returning to Tapuz year after year. We welcome you to join the world-wide Tapuz family.

NBB - continuing the tradition

Since 1954, Camp Northland-B'nai Brith in Haliburton, Ontario has been a unique place for children and young adults to make lasting friendships and spend summers of discovery.

Camp Northland-B'nai Brith is proud to offer a wide variety of activities. Whether a child is artistic, athletic, or a bit of both, we fill the day with an exciting program. Water activities include canoeing, kayaking, waterskiing, sailing and windsurfing. Land activities include arts & crafts, drama, tennis, a challenge ropes course, a climbing wall, and sports of all descriptions.

Our activities are taught by experienced and certified instructors, so that campers can learn and progress within defined skill levels. The swim instruction program is mandated by the Red Cross and Royal Lifesaving Society, and campers can complete all badges, including their Bronze Medallion.

The Judaica program explores the wonder and meaning of our Jewish heritage. At appropriate ages, campers are introduced to themes such as traditional observance, the Holocaust, and Israel.

We believe that the development of self-esteem and self-confidence in children and young adults is our purpose for being. Therefore, Camp Northland-B'nai Brith's program encourages campers to live, work, and play cooperatively and to value each other's strengths and differences. With lots of opportunities, and the encouragement of caring and supportive staff, our campers challenge themselves, and experience success.

Shendy's promotes aquatic total fitness & safety

Swimming is a total fitness exercise for the whole body, using every muscle including the heart. Swimming improves strength and motor co-ordination in children and adults; and it is an ideal exercise for many people with physical challenges, because buoyancy in water eliminates the strain of weight.

Swimming is also part of fun at camp; and all water sports are more fun for a kid who is fit, safe, and comfortable in the water. At Shendy's Swim School, there is an emphasis on both fitness and safety. Eric Shendelman and his staff have helped many students develop their swimming skills, including children and adults with long-standing phobias.

Shendelman, who teaches for the York Region Board of Education, has been actively teaching swimming for 15 years and has been involved in the camping field for over 20 years. He will once again be bringing this experience to his position as Director of Camp Arrowhead this coming summer.

Shendy's instructors keep a 1:3 ratio to students. The teachers are well trained and utilize creative methods to keep the classes fun and students motivated. The staff are always approachable and keep parents up to date on their child's progress throughout each session.

Shendy's offers a wide range of Red Cross and Life Saving programs for all ages. Students gain safety and fitness through these programs.

Once again, Shendy's Swim School, as a commercial member of the Ontario Camping Association, will be offering various leadership and recertification courses throughout the winter and spring sessions. Many camp staff from all over Ontario have accessed these programs to update their skills and qualifications.

For a great learning experience in a friendly and professional aquatic environment, call Eric Shendelman at (905) 763-7915.

Summer Fun Plus a Jewish Environment – for Canadian funds

TORONTO - Until now, parents who wanted a camp that could combine summer fun activities with a Jewish environment that could instill spiritual values in their children on a day by day basis, had to look south of the border — with corresponding penalties in U.S. exchange.

Starting this summer, however, Canadian parents have the option of sending their children to The CCRJ Camp for Living Judaism, less than 2 hours from Toronto on Maple Lake.

Situated on a magnificently wooded lakefront setting, the camp and its programs are designed to help youngsters 8 to 16 years old develop their physical, emotional, social and Jewish skills as well as their self-esteem, all in a supportive non-competitive environment. For many children, it will be their first chance to develop a new day by day awareness of Judaism that they may have previously experienced only at home or synagogue.

New tournament-class tennis, volleyball, basketball and multi-purpose courts, plus state-of-the-art sports and play equipment as well as boating, water skiing, arts and crafts, camp-outs and indoor/outdoor games will deliver everything children have come to expect from a summer camp.

But what makes The CCRJ Camp for Living Judaism the first camp of its kind in Canada is an environment dedicated to building Jewish identities and values. While there are many Canadian camps with a predominantly Jewish enrollment that hold Shabbat services, this particular summer camp adds Torah discussion groups, Havdalah services on Saturday night, Israeli dancing and Judaica arts & crafts programs to enhance campers' Jewishness while offering sports and game activities that are second to none.

Camping programs like this one have been acclaimed as the most transformative Jewish experience of childhood.

According to Rabbi Eric Yoffie, President of Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), "such camps have been the vehicle that has taught tens of thousands of children to see themselves as part of the Jewish people and its memories."

"Camps", Rabbi Yoffie claims, "create a sustainable and transmissable Jewish identity in ways that few other programs can match".

Director of this new camp is Jack Feldman, who — besides a Master's degree in social work and honours B.A. in sociology — brings to The CCRJ Camp for Living Judaism a wealth of camping experience drawn from Camp Lakeland in New York State, Camp B'nai Brith in Canada and White Pine in Northern Ontario.

The Camp is a program of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), which itself is a national affiliate of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), the central North American organization for Reform Judaism.

Enrollment applications are now being accepted for the summer of '99, and families who want registration forms can contact The CCRJ at (905) 709-CCRJ (2275) or call the UAHC toll free at 1-800-560-UAHC (8242).

They can also get more information by contacting the Rabbi, Educator or President of any Reform synagogue in Canada.

Summer Fun. Family Style.

Shaliach enhances Israeli content at Centre Camp

For a fun and memorable summer, plenty of choice in one location, and a heightened awareness of one's Jewish roots, try Centre Camp at the Bathurst Jewish Centre. Here, says Director Patricia Trojman, every child expands their horizon and deepens their roots through new experiences and friendships.

Programs are versatile, with something for everyone. Each child's unique physical, mental and social skills are developed, and new skills are encouraged. Children with special needs are fully integrated into Centre Camp's program.

Do you have a youngster who's never been to camp? For 2 1/2- 4 year olds, there's a 1/2-day program. Children 3-5 enjoy a 3/4-day camp which includes a daily recreational swim and morning transportation.

For ages 4-12, full-day all-round programs include instructional and recreational swims, transportation, barbeques, field trips, theme days, drama, dance (including Israeli folk dances), sports, nature, arts and crafts, music, Judaica and Oneg Shabbat.

Centre Camp will be hosting a Shaliach (Israeli representative) to work with the staff to enhance Israeli content.

Specialty programs for ages 8-12 include Young Einsteins computer program, and Habima Arts camps. The "Chaverim" and "Madrichim" leadership training programs, for teens 13-15, include off-site camping at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith.

Centre Camp's 5-acre site includes woodlands, outdoor pool, beach volleyball, basketball courts, and a 250,000-sq. ft. indoor facility. The sports program S.C.O.R.E. (Sports Camp Organized for Recreation and Education) includes soccer, baseball , tennis and in-line skating. Trojman anticipates further growth in sports over the next few years.

Centre Camp continues to offer S.C.O.R.E. which combines sport instruction and fun under the leadership of Jeff Krupski. New to Centre Camp in '99: My Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum, an Indoor Climbing Wall and Specialty Clinics.

Camp programs throughout the year include Winterlude, Gimme a Break (March break), and Passover camp. Theme days include fun times like Israel Day and Maccabiah Days where kids participate in an all day event.

At Centre Camp, Jewish culture and fun are part of every child's experience. "O Canada!" is sung in the morning, "Hatikvah" in the afternoon; and the Israeli flag flies alongside the Maple Leaf.

With over 10-years experience, Centre Camp is now offering its unique services to a second generation. Let your child be part of it. Centre Camp is minutes away from your front door, at 4588 Bathurst St.; call Patricia Trojman at 416-636-1880, ext. 378.

Think high: think Aviation International

Do you ever dream of flying — soaring above the clouds, as the land spreads out below you in a quilt of fields and city blocks? If the answer is yes, call Adelle Fogle at Aviation International.

Based at Guelph Airpark for over 10 years, Aviation International is licensed by Transport Canada, and has participated in Air Cadet training for the past 4 years, graduating 56 cadets. They also operate a summer camp for 14-17 year olds, to teach them the basics of flying, and encourage them to progress further.

Ground school teaches radio procedures, airframes, engines, flight theory, regulations, aviation medicine, and human factors in aviation.

The 8-10 hours in-flight training, with a licensed instructor in a 2 seat Cessna 150, can be logged as credits towards a Recreational Pilot's Permit or Private Pilot's Licence.

After 2 or 3 flight hours, a student can maneuver in the air, turning, banking, and changing speed and altitude. Take-offs require somewhat more training; and landing, the most exacting skill, takes 12-13 hours. In-flight training also covers emergency procedures, pre-flight inspections and on-board checks.

After about 14 hours of flight, most students can fly solo. For solo flight, however, one summer camp is not enough; and so, through the year, many students return to Aviation International to earn their Recreational Pilot's Permit (minimum age 16).

This permit allows recreational daytime flight in Canada, when visibility is clear, solo or with one passenger. From this level, the student can advance to a Private Pilot's License, at a minimum age of 17; and from here, most pilots progress to their commercial licence.

Flying is both fun and opportunity. The older generation of pilots is retiring, leaving many openings for younger people. There are more opportunities for women now too, because woman students are needed to fill the quotas. Nor do all pilots fly for commercial enterprises.

Aerial photography and remote sensing are used, for example, to measure air pollution.

The physical requirements of flying encourage responsibility and a healthy lifestyle. Training is thorough and challenging; alcohol and drugs are prohibited while flying; and every permit or licence requires a yearly medical.

This unique camp runs from July 5-16, 9 a.m.-4 p.m. For details, call 519-824-2660. Call now, though: there's a 12 student limit, and the application deadline is May 21.

Camp Ramah inspires today's youth

Camp Ramah, on Skeleton Lake offers a quality camping program in the framework of traditional Jewish practice. Under the directorship of Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, Ramah offers the total camping experience for children in grades 3-10. Our safe and comprehensive waterfront program staffed by certified instructors is a highlight for our campers. Sports is an integral part of every camper's development, focusing on skills, teamwork, and sportsmanship. Arts activities allow each camper to realize their creative potential through projects, performances, and individualized instruction. Outdoors programs take full advantage of the camp's beautiful setting while raising our camper's environmental awareness. A new ropes course gives campers and staff a chance to work together towards shared goals.

Judaica, Hebrew, and Israel programming are a regular part of the camp day. Jewish texts are taught by young adults in an informal setting. Hebrew is spoken, heard and often becomes second nature at camp. Shabbat, prayer and ritual observance assume special qualities when experienced and shared with friends.

Ramah continues to offer a unique one month program for campers with special needs. The Tikvah ("Hope") program gives adolescents ages 12 and older an opportunity to enjoy every aspect of camp while defining their own Jewish identity.

Staff is often former campers who return to Ramah because of the deep-rooted commitment to the Ramah environment. Young people develop skills and leadership, enduring friendships and a Jewish consciousness that help them become vibrant members of their family and home community.

Israel camp for girls fosters individual growth

Overnight camps have long been recognized as an excellent supplement to a year-round Torah education. Camping fosters varied opportunities for individual growth. Group living, independence, formal as well as informal learning, song, dance, drama, swimming, etc. are just some of the benefits offered in this natural surrounding.

But ... a new dimension has been added at N'Vei Ashdod. For the past 15 years N'Vei Ashdod has provided all these things, and more ... in Eretz Yisrael where everything takes on a special flavour.

Lively, frum girls from all over the world come to Camp N'Vei Ashdod and forge lifelong friendships. It is indeed rare to find so many girls from so many places, blending so naturally. Perhaps it is the love for Eretz Yisrael which brings them so close together.

Situated in beautiful central Israel, in a tranquil, fully enclosed, modern campus with an enormous pool, beautiful grounds and air-conditioned dining room, N'Vei Ashdod combines learning, sports, fun and excitement with extensive touring throughout Israel.

The girls travel across the country in air-conditioned buses with the finest tour guides available. The whole time, security is top priority.

Shabbos, whether in camp or outside, is particularly special; picture Shabbos in the old city of Jerusalem, or in the Ir HaKodesh of Tzfat. Guest lecturers, Talmidei Chachomim, authors and well known Torah personalities add an extra dimension to the Israel experience.

N'Vei Ashdod, the touring camp for girls ages 10-17 in Israel is now in its 15th summer.

"More than a summer camp experience - it's the experience of a lifetime"

Hillcrest: fun for youngsters

Centrally located in the beautiful, green Hogg's Hollow Valley at Yonge and York Mills. Our unique camp caters solely to the pre-school set ages 2½ to 5 years.

We provide an enriched, creative and nurturing environment while maintaining the highest safety standards.

A low camper/counselor ratio helps to ensure each child is made to feel comfortable and secure in what is often their first camp experience. Our staff is comprised of Hillcrest teachers, student teachers from the Early Childhood Education Program and mature, experienced counselors.

The rolling camp grounds and the adventure type playground provide a setting for exploration and fun. Our trained Red Cross swim staff are sensitive to new and experienced swimmers, providing your child with a feeling of security and confidence in the water.

In our pottery, arts & crafts and drama programs your child's imagination will blossom with our creative and stimulating "hands-on" experience. Our computer program will add an additional element of fun and learning.

Music is one of the highlights at Hillcrest Day Camp. The music program is directed by our music specialist, Kayla.

Idiot's Guide to Jewish History, Culture a blast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Those of us who frequent book shops cannot have failed to notice a fairly new line of self-help volumes published by Alpha Books under the generic title of The Complete Idiot's Guide To...

This popular series deals with topics ranging from computers and wine to pets and health care.

The latest subject – you guessed it – is about Jews. The Complete Idiot's Guide To Jewish History and Culture, written by Rabbi Benjamin Blech, is a blast. It is informative and droll, and certainly worth a place in your library.

Rabbi Blech, an American educator and lecturer, covers all the bases with erudition and humor. He is fluently conversant with what seems like every conceivable subject under the sun. And he possesses a simple, felicitous writing style.

He sets the tone early on in this 406-page primer. His definition of the Knesset, Israel's parliament, is apt. The Knesset, he blithely observes, "consists of 120 politicians who meet together regularly to shout, yell and insult each other while passing laws." To be honest, I have never found a better definition of this rowdy body.

Attuned to the short attention span of most readers, the good rabbi dispenses information succinctly and liberally, barely catching his breath before he is off to the next scintillating topic.

He asks many questions, and answers them with ease. A sampler: Who is a Jew? Who is the greatest Jew who ever lived? Why are there so many Jewish comedians? Is suicide worse than homicide in Jewish law? What did Mohammed borrow from Judaism? What was the Council of Four Lands? Where was the first ghetto? What does Maccabee mean in Hebrew?

Rabbi Blech does not always get it right. He claims, for instance, that the Arabs launched the Yom Kippur War "to destroy Israel." Not exactly. The truth is a little bit more complicated.

But, hey, I'm not complaining. I recommend this book highly. Congratulations, Rabbi!

Roman rebellion

Israel: An Illustrated History (Oxford University Press) takes you from the dawn of recorded history to the present day. The author, Daniel Schroeter, holds the Teller Family Chair in Jewish History at the University of California in Irvine.

Schroeter is extremely well versed, and presents the material in a readable fashion.

He discusses the many names Israel has had over the centuries. He assesses David's reign and Solomon's rule.

In addition, he analyzes the Roman occupation of Palestine, the Jewish rebellions against Roman hegemony, the arrival of Muslim, Mamluk and Ottoman conquerors, and the status of Jews during these periods.

Seguing into the 19th century, Schroeter raises the question of Zionism and the Jewish settlement of the land in all its permutations. His pen portraits of Theodor Herzl and other Zionist thinkers are instructive, as is his evaluation of the first violent stirrings of Arab-Jewish tension in the second decade of this century.

Schroeter's tour d'horizon of the Zionist drive for statehood is compelling, and his essay on developments since the Six Day War is a model of its kind.

Curl up with Israel: An Illustrated History and The Complete Idiot's Guide To Jewish History and Culture. You'll learn a lot from these illuminating books.
